[SS] Are very uſeful as well as entertaining.] It is really not a little ſtrange, that, conſidering Cromwell was towards forty when he firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf in oppoſing the project for draining of fens, that we ſhould know ſo little of his private life; and how little this is, the reader has already ſeen, moſt of the circumſtances that deſerve credit being mentioned either in the text or in the notes (279). Yet ſome few there were who knew and underſtood him thoroughly, before his extraordinary talents were made known to the world, and in particular his couſin Hampden, of which this was a remarkable inſtance (280). When things ran high in the Houſe of Commons, Mr. Hampden and the Lord Digby were going down the Parliament ſtairs, and Cromwell juſt before them, who was known to the latter only by ſight: Pray, ſaid his Lordſhip to Mr. Hampden, who is that man, for I ſee he is on our ſide by his ſpeaking ſo warmly to-day? That ſloven, returned Mr. Hampden, whom you ſee before us, who hath no ornament in his ſpeech, that ſloven, I ſay, if we ſhould ever come to a breach with the King, which God forbid! in ſuch a caſe, I ſay, that ſloven will be the greateſt man in England. This prophecy, which was ſo fully accompliſhed, roſe chiefly from the ſenſe that great man had of Cromwell's indefatigable diligence in purſuing whatever he undertook: and, in truth, he had this remarkable quality in a very high degree, for whatever he had in view, remained ever in his thoughts, and every thing he ſaid or did was ſome way calculated to promote it; ſo that if ſteadineſs, vigilance, and addreſs, could attain any point, as indeed what point is there they will not attain, he was ſure to accompliſh whatever he thought worthy of undertaking (281). He had another quality, which was equally uſeful to him, and that was, diſcerning the temper of thoſe he had to deal with, and dealing with them accordingly. Before he became Commander in Chief, he kept up a very high intimacy with the private men, taking great pains to learn their names, by which he was ſure to call them, ſhaking them by the hand, clapping them on the ſhoulder, or, which was peculiar to him, giving them a ſlight box on the ear, which condeſcending familiarities, with the paſſion he expreſſed for their intereſts, gave him a power eaſier conceived than deſcribed (282). He tried to inveigle the Earl of Manchеſter; but finding his ſentiments of another kind, he fell upon him in the Houſe of Commons, and procured his removal. He carried himſelf with ſo much reſpect to Fairfax, that he knew not how to break with him, though he knew that he betrayed him (283). He not only deceived Harriſon, Bradſhaw, and Ludlow, but outwitted Oliver St. John, who had more parts than them all, and foiled Sir Henry Vane with his own weapons. In ſhort, he knew men perfectly, worked them to his purpoſes, as if they had been cattle, and, which is ſtill more wonderful, did that often while they conceived that they were making a tool of him (284). His ſtrength of mind, or ſtrength of head, call it which you will, enabled him to impoſe even upon the greateſt bodies of men. He led the reſentment of the Houſe of Commons againſt the Army, till the latter were in a flame, and very angry with him: when he came to them, it was upon a flea-bitten nag, all of a foam, as if he had made his eſcape; and, in this trim, he ſigned the engagement at Triploe-Heath, throwing himſelf from his horſe upon the graſs, and writing his name as he lay upon his belly (285). He had yet another faculty beyond theſe, and that was, the art of concealing his arts. He dictated a paper once to Ireton, which was impoſed upon the Agitators as if founded upon their inſtructions, who ſent it expreſs by two of their number, Sexby (who conſpired againſt him when Protector) and Laſinby, to Cromwell, then Lieutenant-General, at his quarters at Colcheſter. He was in bed when they came, but they demanded and had admittance. When they told him their commiſſion, he aſked them, with the greateſt rage and reſentment in his looks, how they durſt bring him papers from the Army? they ſaid, That paper contained the ſenſe of the Army, and they were directed to do it. Are you ſure of that? ſaid he, with the ſame ſtern countenance, Let me ſee it. He ſpent a long time in reading it, and, as it ſeemed to them, in reflecting upon it: then, with a mild and devout look, he told them it was a moſt juſt thing, he hoped that God would proſper it, adding, I will ſtand by the Army in theſe deſires with my life and fortune (286). In the courſe of his life he was temperate and ſober, and deſpiſed thoſe that were otherwiſe. He knew perfectly well the means of conciliating friendſhip, in which he was very conſtant to thoſe who went all his lengths, as the Earl of Warwick, and ſome others, did (287): and could be very civil to ſuch as diſapproved his meaſures, provided they did not oppoſe them, which was the caſe of St. John, Whitlocke, and others (288): but if they differed with him, he forgot all former ties, as appeared by his impriſoning Sir Henry Vane, removing Major-General Harriſon, and obliging the Lord Viſcount Say and the Lord Grey of Groby to live in a kind of voluntary exile (289). In his family he ſhewed great kindneſs, but without any diminution of his authority. He was very reſpectful to his mother, and very tender towards his wife (290); yet neither had any influence over him: he expreſſed a deep ſenſe of the concern which the former expreſſed for his danger, heard whatever ſhe ſaid to him patiently, but acted as he thought proper, and, in reſpect to her burial, directly againſt her dying requeſt (291). The latter is ſaid to have made a propoſition, tending towards reſtoring the King, but he rejected it (292), as he had before ſhewn himſelf unmoved, when his ſon Richard threw himſelf at his feet, to diſſwade him from taking King Charles's life (293). He did not ſeem to take amiſs applications of the like kind from other perſons, as from Whitlocke (294); but that Gentleman thought he loſt his confidence by it; from the Marquis of Hertford, whom he treated very reſpectfully (295); and from Dr. Brownrig, Biſhop of Exeter, to whom he ſhewed more kindneſs than to any other man of his rank and profeſſion, and of whom, with ſome earneſtneſs, he aſked advice (296): My advice, ſaid the good Prelate, muſt be in the words of the goſpel; Render to Cæſar the things that are Cæſar's, and to God the things that are God's: to which he made no reply. All this ſhews a very great, a very unuſual calmneſs of mind; yet he was naturally haſty and paſſionate, which thoſe who were about him ſometimes felt (297); but he knew how to compoſe matters again by a proper and an immediate condeſcenſion, of which he gave a ſtrong inſtance to Lord Broghill, and another to Secretary Thurloe. He knew the force of family connections, and employed them very ſucceſsfully. It was by this that he managed Ireton, and afterwards Fleetwood (298). The dealers in ſecret, or rather, ſcandalous hiſtory, ſay, he found another method of managing Lambert; which there is no need to believe, ſince it is viſible that he cajoled him for a long time with the hopes of the ſucceſſion (299). He married all his daughters well, and was kind to their huſbands; but it is ſaid he gave them no fortunes, which, if true, muſt have been becauſe it was not in his power. Some have wondered that he did not court the alliance of ſome foreign houſe; and ſomething of this kind was once ſpoken of for the Prince of Conde, for whom he had a particular kindneſs, and aimed at making him great in the ſame way as himſelf: he ſerved in the Spaniſh army againſt his natural Prince; the Protector was for making him a Sovereign at the expence of the Spaniards he ſerved, by giving him the beſt part of their Low-Countries; but the French would not agree to this, and ſo it came to nothing, as the buſineſs of the match had done long before. He is cenſured for keeping his eldeſt ſon at a diſtance from buſineſs, and for giving him no employments (300); but for this, perhaps, there is not any juſt ground. He married him to a Lady who brought him a good fortune: he ſuffered him to purſue the bent of his inclinations, and to lead the life of a plain, honeſt, country Gentleman; which, for a time, was highly ſuitable to his own intereſts, as it ſeemed to correſpond with the terms of the Inſtrument of Government, and the diſlike which the Protector, when firſt ſo called, expreſſed of hereditary right (301). When he had afterwards brought about a change in affairs, he altered, at the ſame time, his conduct towards his ſon, named him the firſt Lord in his other Houſe, reſigned to him the Chancellorſhip of Oxford (302), and went as far as he could go, for fear of diſobliging Fleetwood. His ſecond ſon, Henry, he ſent over into Ireland, where he raiſed him gradually to the poſt of Lord Lieutenant (303). Though in this he ſeemed to give him the preference, yet in reality he uſed him more harſhly than the other; for, though his abilities were good, his manners irreproachable, and his ſubmiſſion exemplary, yet he paid no great deference to his recommendations, and allowed him far leſs power than could well be imagined (304). His daughter Claypole was his favourite, and her huſband had much of his confidence: he was maſter of his horſe, and had the Court ſecret in the Houſe of Commons (305). It is however to be obſerved, that as his government was diſtracted and diſturbed, ſo he was unhappy alſo in his family. Neither of his ſons thought his eſtabliſhment ſecure or well founded. His daughter Fleetwood was a Republican, and ſo were many others of his neareſt relations: all the reſt of his daughters had a ſecret kindneſs for the Royal Family, of which however he was not ignorant (306). He ſhewed a great reſpect for learning and learned men, without affecting to be learned himſelf. His letters are however the beſt teſtimonies of his parts, for they are varied in their ſtile in a very wonderful manner, exactly adapted to the purpoſes for which they were written, and the perſons to whom they were addreſſed (307). His public ſpeeches were long, dark, and perplexed; and though mixed with the language of the times, which was cant, yet have ſentiments in them that ſhew very clearly the ſuperiority of his underſtanding (308). In his converſation he was eaſy and pleaſant, and could unbend himſelf without loſing his dignity. He made an excellent choice in thoſe he employed, but truſted none of them farther than was neceſſary (309). It may ſeem ſtrange, that in drawing together his character, there ſhould be nothing ſaid of his principles as to government or religion; but the plain truth is, neither can be diſcovered with certainty. We know that he hated a Commonwealth and the Preſbyterians, but what his ſentiments were in other reſpects it is hardly poſſible to ſay. When he recollected himſelf, after the follies of his youth, there ſeems to be no doubt that he had ſerious impreſſions of religion; and there ſeem to be very ſtrong proofs, that he was afterwards tinctured with enthuſiaſm (310). In the time of his greateſt elevation, to ſuppoſe him a Fanatick, ſeems injuſtice to his parts; to affirm, as ſome have done, that he loſt all ſenſe of religion, is more, than, at this diſtance of time, any authorities will warrant. Such as entertain the beſt opinion of him allow, that he fell into deep and dangerous errors, particularly in believing that ſucceſs was a mark of the divine approbation (311). Thoſe who ſpeak worſt of him, charge him with a contempt of all things ſacred (312). But, in a matter of this obſcurity, let us call in the aſſiſtance of one, who knew him well, and could judge of him in that reſpect much better than we (313). This is the famous Mr. Baxter, who ſpeaks very ſenſibly and clearly to the point. 'His name ſtandeth as a 'monitory monument, or pillar to poſterity, to tell 'them the inſtability of man in ſtrong temptations, 'if God leave him to himſelf: What great ſucceſs 'and victories can do, to lift up a mind that once 'ſeemed humble: What pride can do, to make men 'ſelfiſh, and corrupt the heart with ill deſigns: What 'ſelfiſhneſs and ill deſigns can do, to bribe the con'ſcience, and corrupt the judgment, and make men 'juſtify the greateſt errors and ſins, and ſet againſt 'the cleareſt truth and duty: What bloodſhed and 'great enormities of life an erring deluded judgment 'may draw men to and patronize; and that when 'God hath dreadful judgments, an erroneous ſectary, 'or a proud ſelf-ſeeker, is oftener his inſtrument, 'than an humble lamb-like innocent ſaint.' It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that ſo great a man as the Earl of Clarendon (314), ſhould mention the Protector's ſpeaking kindly of Biſhops, and as if there was ſomething good in that order if the droſs was ſcoured off; ſo as to ſhew he took him to be really in earneſt. The whole courſe of Cromwell's life proves, that he was not at all ſteady to the form of religion, ſuppoſing that he retained any principles at the bottom; and there ſeems to be very little doubt, that the true meaning of theſe flattering expreſſions was, his deſire to return to the old form of government; for, whatever he pretended, that was his great aim. He did not overturn the conſtitution to leave it in ruins, but to ſet it up again, and himſelf at the head of it (315); and though he compared his own government at firſt to that of a High-Conſtable, yet there is nothing clearer, than that all he laboured for afterwards was to get the chaos new moulded, and his own authority ſanctified by the regal title, and the appearance of a legal Parliament (316).

Cromwell was born the 4th, and baptized the 19th of October, 1626, and died July 13th, 1712, at Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire (w). 2. Henry Cromwell, born January the 20th, 1627, chriſtened the next day, died March 25th, 1674 (x). (1.) Bridget, who firſt married Commiſſary-General Ireton, and, after his deceaſe, Lieutenant-General Fleetwood. As both her huſbands were zealous Republicans, ſhe had no ſmall tincture of the ſame ſpirit, which was very diſpleaſing to her father. In other reſpects ſhe was a woman of very good ſenſe, regular in her behaviour, and was highly inſtrumental in promoting the intereſts of her ſecond huſband, who was very much guided by her advice (y). (2.) Elizabeth, born Anno Domini 1630; ſhe married John Claypole, Eſq; a Northamptonſhire Gentleman, whom the Protector made Maſter of the Horſe, created him a Baronet July 16th, 1657, and appointed him one of his Lords (z). (3.) Mary, who was married, with great ſolemnity, to the Lord Viſcount Fauconberg, November 13th, 1657, but the ſame day more privately, according to the office in the Common-Prayer Book. She was a Lady of great beauty, and of a very high ſpirit; one who, after her brother Richard was depoſed, is thought to have promoted very ſucceſsfully the reſtoration of King Charles. Her huſband was ſent to the Tower by the Committee of Safety, and was in very high favour with King Charles the Second. He was raiſed to the dignity of an Earl by King William, and died on the laſt day of the year 1700. His lady ſurvived him to March 14th, 1712, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf to her death, by the quickneſs of her wit and the ſolidity of her judgment (a). (4.) Frances, his youngeſt daughter, was twice married; firſt to Mr. Robert Rich, grandſon to the Earl of Warwick, November 11th, 1657, who died the 16th of February following; and afterwards to Sir John Ruſſell, of Chippenham in Cambridgeſhire, by whom ſhe left ſeveral children, and lived to a great age (b). One, who pretends to a great acquaintance with the family, gives us an extraordinary ſtory of this Lady in the earlier part of her life (c) [TT].

[TT] Gives us an extraordinary ſtory of this Lady in the earlier part of her life.] We have this ſtory in ſeveral books; but the beſt account of it that I have met met with is in the Hiſtory of the Stuarts, written by Mr. Oldmixon, which therefore I ſhall give the reader in his own words (317): 'One of his domeſtic Chaplains, Mr. Jeremy White, a ſprightly man, and a top wit of his Court, was ſo ambitious as to make his addreſſes to Lady Frances, the Protector's youngeſt daughter. The young Lady did not diſencourage him, and this piece of innocent gallantry, in ſo religious a Court, could not be carried on without ſpies. Oliver was told of it, and he was much concerned at it, obliging the perſon who told him to be on the watch, and told him if he could give him any ſubſtantial proof he ſhould be very well rewarded, and White ſeverely puniſhed. The ſpy followed the matter ſo cloſe, that he hunted Jerry White, as he was generally termed, to the Lady's chamber, and ran immediately to the Protector with this news. Oliver, in a rage, haſtened thither himſelf, and going in haſtily, found Jerry on his knees, kiſſing the Lady's hand, or having juſt kiſſed it. Cromwell, in a fury, aſked, What was the meaning of that poſture before his daughter Frank? White, with a great deal of preſence of mind, ſaid, May it pleaſe your Highneſs, I have a long time courted that young gentlewoman there, my Lady's woman, and cannot prevail; I was therefore humbly praying her Ladyſhip to intercede for me. The Protector, turning to the young woman, cried, What's the meaning of this, huſſy? Why do you refuſe the honour Mr. White would do you? he is my friend, and I expect you ſhould treat him as ſuch. My Lady's woman, who deſired nothing more, with a very low curteſy, replied, If Mr. White intends me that honour, I ſhall not be againſt him. Sayſt thou ſo, my laſs? cried Cromwell, Call Godwyn. This buſineſs ſhall be done preſently, before I go out of the room. Mr. White was gone too far to go back: the Parſon came; Jerry and my Lady's woman were married in the preſence of the Protector, who gave her five hundred pounds for her portion; and that, with the money ſhe had ſaved before, made Mr. White eaſy in his circumſtances, except in one thing, which was, that he never loved his wife nor ſhe him, though they lived together near fifty years afterwards. I knew them both, and heard this ſtory told when Mrs. White was preſent, who did not contradict it.' This ſingular ſtory I was induced to inſert for ſeveral reaſons, being well aſſured, that, independently of Mr. Oldmixon's credit, who, in matters of this nature, was however a perſon very well informed, the facts upon which it depends are abſolutely true, and were often related by Mr. White himſelf; and, if I have not been miſinformed, to his Majeſty King Charles II. It is an admirable inſtance of the Protector's ſagacity in keeping ſpies within doors and without, as well as a moſt pregnant proof of his preſence of mind, and great dexterity in finding and applying the proper remedy at once, and upon the firſt diſcovery of the diſeaſe, however ſudden or unexpected. That theſe notes have not been loaded with many particularities in relation to the wonderful nicety and amazing extent of Cromwell's intelligence, is owing to more cauſes than one. The relations themſelves are common enough, and almoſt in every body's mouth: in the next place, they are not ſo wonderful as is commonly imagined; for all governments have their ſpies and ſecret intelligence, though they are not deſirous of making this known to the world. Yet we muſt not imagine that it was ignorance in Cromwell, or in his Miniſter Thurloe, to publiſh ſo much upon this head: for whereas in other governments the great point is, to gain intelligence without its being known; in reſpect to his it was quite contrary, for his intereſt conſiſted in being thought to have better and quicker intelligence than he really had. Laſtly, though this did infinite honour to his adminiſtration, yet in reality it ſhewed the weakneſs of his government; and therefore it is a right remark of Mr. Coke, that it kept him always neceſſitous, and was in reality that gaping gulph, through which all the money that he could amaſs ſlipped away; ſo that it might be truly ſaid, that if he was preſerved by it in one ſenſe, he was undone by it in another; and therefore, when the public accounts came to be examined in Richard's Parliament, what was iſſued for ſecret ſervice was not only thought extravagant but impoſſible: and indeed, how much ſoever it may aſtoniſh vulgar Politicians, refined Stateſmen will very hardly allow, that a government which cannot ſubſiſt but by the diſtribution of vaſt ſums in this way, is to be either admired or applauded; becauſe the excellence of government conſiſts in managing public affairs well, and without exorbitant expence; ſo that the beſt government is that which is at the leaſt charge. Theſe reflections detract nothing from the Protector's ſkill or abilities. It is a misfortune to meet with continual ſtorms in a voyage; but the Pilot nevertheleſs deſerves praiſe, who ſecures his veſſel from periſhing in thoſe ſtorms, and ſtill more praiſe, if the veſſel itſelf be rotten and leaky. C.

(317) Oldmixon's Hiſtory of the Stuarts, vol. i. p. 426.

 [In the copious and candid account which our ingenious predeceſſor, Dr. Campbell, has given of the Life of Oliver Cromwell, there are but few things to which any juſt exceptions can be made. The Doctor is probably wrong in his aſſertion, p. 478, that Cromwell was ſo far from having any intereſt at Cambridge, that in reality he was not ſo much as known there, and that if he had been known he would never have been elected Member of Parliament for that town. Not to mention his having been educated at Sidney College in that Univerſity, it was not likely that a Gentleman who lived ſo near as Huntingdon, and who was of ſo active a ſpirit, ſhould have been totally a ſtranger at Cambridge. Beſides, it is certain, that his zeal in oppoſing the drainage of the Bedford Level, muſt have already acquired him ſome degree of popularity.

There is another circumſtance in which we cannot agree with our able Predeceſſor, or with Lord Clarendon, on whom the remark is founded. Speaking of the Remonſtrance which was carried on the 14th of November, 1641, Dr. Campbell ſays, that "if Zeal "for the Church, or Duty to the King, could have "kept ten more of thoſe, who made ſuch ſtrong pro-"feſſions of both, from their ſuppers and their beds "for a few hours, all the conſequences of that fatal "night had been prevented." p. 479. But we can ſcarcely think that the whole future fate of the nation depended on the failure of ſo ſmall a number of perſons, on a ſingle occaſion. If the remonſtrance had at that time chanced to have been loſt by one or two votes, the ſpirit of the party in oppoſition to the meaſures of the Court was too high, and they were too ſtrongly ſupported by a powerful body in the nation, to be eaſily diſcouraged. They would probably have ſeized every opportunity of renewing and urging the buſineſs, till it was crowned with ſucceſs.

It is a miſtake to aſſert, as is done in note [CC], that Barebone's Parliament had voted that the common law was a badge of ſlavery. No ſuch reſolution occurs in the proceedings of that Aſſembly, as ſtated in the Parliamentary Hiſtory. They did, indeed, revive the conſideration of a bill which had been propoſed in the laſt Parliament, for correcting the grievances and inconveniences of legal proceedings, and a Committee was appointed for forming a new body or model of the law. But the deſign of this appointment was not to deſtroy the law or put it down, as was falſely reported, but to ſeparate laws that were uſeleſs and out of date from the wholeſome, juſt, and good ones, and to reduce the laſt into a deſirable ſyſtem. It is true that the ſame Parliament voted the aboliſhment of the Court of Chancery; but, even in this caſe, it was ordered that proviſion ſhould be made for deciding matters of equity for the future, in a method that ſhould be leſs tedious, expenſive and troubleſome to the ſuitors (318). By the way, Barebone's Parliament has been treated with unjuſt contempt by the greater part of our hiſtorians, and they have paſſed over its Proceedings in a very ſlight and ſuperficial manner. Mrs. Macaulay ſtands exempted from this cenſure. It is a fact that this Parliament was not deſtitute of ſome able men, who formed ſeveral important deſigns for the public welfare. The tranſactions of that Aſſembly are fully related in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, the narrative of which is concluded with the following obſervations. "We are "very far from entering into a vindication of this "unconſtitutional Aſſembly. It is certain that the "manner of their being convened, in obedience to "Cromwell's Warrant of Nomination, was the moſt "flagrant (318) Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. xx. p. 189. 198. 234.

But whe- " ther they deſerve all the ignominy which has been " caſt upon them by the contemporary hiſtorians we " have cited in our account of their tranſactions, and " ſome modern writers who have implicitly copied " them, will beſt appear by the laws they made, and " the bills they were employed about at the time of " their diſſolution (319)."

Vowell, the Schoolmaſter, mentioned p. 501, as having been executed at Charing-Croſs, ſummoned Cromwell and his Judges to appear at the Tribunal of God, for the unjuſt ſentence pronounced upon him (320).

(320) From a Correſpondent.

At firſt ſight, it may ſeem very ſtrange that Cromwell ſhould amuſe himſelf with ſuch an exerciſe as that of driving a coach; but Bate, in his Elenchus, has explained this circumſtance. " Qui nephriti- " cus erat, ac Arenulis multoties vexatus, varia non- " nunquam ingurgitabat potulenta; deinde vehe- " mentiori aliquo ac multiplici Motu Corpus agita- " bat; puta Equitatione aut in Carruca, ut impetu " facto Veſicam exoneraret (321)." Thus it is probable that he had recourſe to the extraordinary exerciſe deſcribed in the text for the purpoſe of obtaining ſome relief under the complaint of the gravel.

(321) Ibid.

The points in which our predeceſſor is moſt deficient, are with regard to the family and early life of Oliver Cromwell, though the information is as full as could at that time have reaſonably been expected. Theſe circumſtances have lately been the reſult of very minute and anxious enquiry, and hence great light has been thrown upon them. The Gentleman to whom the public has been the moſt obliged in this reſpect, is the Rev. Mr. Mark Noble, who in his curious and entertaining work, entitled, " Memoirs of " the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell," hath deduced the genealogy of the Cromwells from an early period, and given a particular account of every branch of the family. Mr. Noble, at the ſame time, has taken great pains to correct the errors of preceding writers upon the ſubject; and among other circumſtances, hath ſhewn that our Predeceſſor was probably wrong in rejecting the idea that there was an affinity between Oliver Cromwell's Anceſtors and John Lord Williams, who, after filling ſome of the moſt important offices under our Sovereigns, died in the beginning of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, without leaving male iſſue ſurviving. In oppoſition to what is aſſerted in note [A], Mr. Noble appears to have clearly proved, that the Cromwells had originally the Sirname of Williams; and that there is not any foundation for the hearſay report of Fuller, that there was no relation between the Putney Cromwells and the family of the Protector Oliver (322).

(322) Memoirs of the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell, vol. i. p. 235—242.

For the hiſtory of the various branches of the Cromwells, preceding Oliver, we ſhall content ourſelves with referring to Mr. Noble's work, with the exception of taking ſome notice of what is ſaid concerning the Protector's father and mother.

Mr. Robert Cromwell had, by the will of his father, an eſtate in and near the town of Huntingdon, conſiſting chiefly, if not entirely, of poſſeſſions that formerly belonged to the Monaſtery of St. Mary for Auguſtine Friars, and amounting, with the great tythes of Hartford, to about three hundred pounds a year. His principal reſidence was in Huntingdon; and though he was a Gentleman of good ſenſe, and of competent learning, he was ſo fond of private life, that he is ſuppoſed never to have wiſhed for any employment in the ſtate. His ambition was ſufficiently gratified by a Seat for his own Borough, in the Parliament which was held in the thirty-fifth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, and by a place upon the Bench as a Juſtice of the Peace. In 1600, he appears to have been one of the Bailiffs of Huntingdon; and in 1605, he joined with his brother Sir Oliver, and ſixteen others, in ſubſcribing a certificate to the Privy Council, that the work of draining the Fens in the counties of Northampton, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Cambridge, was feaſible, and might be performed without peril to any haven or county. With regard to a life like his, which furniſhes little matter to a Biographer, Mr. Noble obſerves, that the Philoſopher can ſcarcely avoid reflecting upon the ſtrange contrariety of men's minds, even among thoſe of the neareſt affinity in blood; ſince no character could be more oppoſite to this Gentleman's, than that of his ſon. From the happy and ſerene pleaſures of domeſtic life, Mr. Robert Cromwell was prematurely taken, to the great grief of a beloved wife, and ſeveral children; the latter of whom were juſt of ſufficient age to lament the loſs. His remains were depoſited at All Saints, in Huntingdon, on the twenty-fourth of June, 1617. By his will he bequeathed to Mrs. Cromwell two thirds of his property (excluſively of her jointure) for the term of twenty-one years, towards maintaining his daughters; and to his daughters he gave ſix hundred pounds, which were owing to him by his brother Whalley. Mrs. Cromwell's fortune is ſuppoſed to have conſiſted chiefly of the jointure ſhe poſſeſſed from her firſt huſband, who was William Lynne, Gentleman, ſon and heir-apparent of John Lynne of Baſſingbourne, Eſq. It was to eaſe the expences incident to a numerous progeny, and which are ſo much felt where the eſtate is ſmall, and the deſcent ancient, that Mr. Cromwell was obliged to carry on a large brewing buſineſs. This, however, was principally conducted by ſervants, whoſe accounts were entirely inſpected by Mrs. Cromwell herſelf. It may hence be collected that her huſband was rather of an indolent diſpoſition.

Mrs. Cromwell was a careful, prudent mother, and brought up her family, after ſhe became a widow, in a very handſome, though frugal manner. This ſhe was chiefly enabled to do from the profits ariſing from the brewhouſe, which ſhe carried on upon her own account, and with ſo much ſucceſs, that ſhe gave each of her daughters a fortune ſufficient to marry them to perſons of genteel families. The reſpective Gentlemen to whom they were married are mentioned in note [C]. The greateſt fondneſs of Mrs. Cromwell was laviſhed upon her only ſon; and his conduct to her was every way deſerving of her affection. He always behaved to her in the moſt filial and tender manner; and when he had exalted himſelf to ſovereign greatneſs, he aſſigned her apartments in the Palace at Whitehall, where ſhe continued until her deceaſe, which happened on the eighteenth of November, 1654. It was with reluctance that ſhe partook of the pageantry of Sovereignty, and ſhe remained undazzled with its ſplendour. Her regard for Oliver, and the apprehenſion ſhe entertained of his danger, kept her in ſuch conſtant alarm, that ſhe was diſcontented if ſhe did not ſee him twice a day. The report of a gun was never heard by her, without her crying out, " my ſon is ſhot." Though ſhe was averſe to Oliver's Protectorate, ſhe ſeldom troubled him with advice: but when ſhe aſſumed that liberty, he always heard her with attention, while, at the ſame time, he purſued his own meaſures. It was her dying requeſt that her funeral might be a private one, and that her body might not be depoſited in Weſtminſter Abbey. In this reſpect, however, he acted directly contrary to her injunctions; for he conveyed her remains, with great ſolemnity, and attended with many hundred torches, though it was day-light, to the dormitory of our Engliſh Monarchs. This vanity, in burying his mother with the pomp of royalty, and the expence with which it was accompanied, gave much offence to the republicans. After the reſtoration, her body was taken up, and, together with others, was indecently thrown into a hole made before the back door of the apartments belonging to one of the Prebendaries of Weſtminſter. Mrs. Cromwell was an amiable woman, and much beloved, not only by her own relations, but by thoſe of her huſband. Sir Oliver Cromwell is underſtood to have had a particular eſteem and regard for her. There is an original picture of her in the poſſeſſion of the Earl of Sandwich at Hinchinbrooke, with an engraving of which Mr. Noble has favoured the public. Another portrait of her, taken when ſhe was only twenty-one years of age, belongs to the Miſs Cromwells. There is alſo, at Hinchinbrooke, a picture of Mr. Robert Cromwell, in which there is a languor of countenance, that indicates him to have been a ſickly man (323).

(323) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 82—87.

Mr. Noble has related ſome circumſtances concerning the early life of Oliver, which ſhould not be omitted. His infancy is ſaid to have been marked by a peculiar accident which ſeemed to threaten the life of the future Protector. His grandfather, Sir Henry Cromwell, having ſent for him to Hinchinbrooke, when he was an infant in arms, a monkey took him from the cradle, and ran with him upon the lead that covered the roofing of the houſe. Alarmed at the danger of the child, the family ſpread beds to catch him upon, fearing leſt the creature ſhould drop him: but the ſagacious animal brought the fortune of England down in ſafety. Thus narrow was the eſcape which he, who was doomed to be the Conqueror, and the Sovereign Magiſtrate of three kingdoms, had from the jaws of a monkey.

Whilſt Oliver Cromwell was at the Grammar-School in Huntingdon, he is generally repreſented as having manifeſted an aſpiring, ſtubborn, and obſtinate temper, by which he incurred the ſevere correction of his father, and the flagellation of his maſter, Dr. Beard, who, in his treatment of him, was obliged to exceed the diſcipline uſual to youths of his birth and expectations. According to the account of his enemies, he was at this time the terror of the neighbourhood, by his depredations upon orchards and dove-houſes. Theſe circumſtances have been magnified, by prejudiced writers, into enormous offences: but the only real inference from them is, that, like other active and ſpirited boys, he had a diſpoſition that led him to playfulneſs and miſchief. It is probable that his bold and daring turn of mind might often bring him into danger. When a youth, he was near drowning, but was ſaved by Mr. Johnſon, a Clergyman. Many years after, as Oliver was marching at the head of his ſoldiers through Huntingdon, he recognized this Gentleman, and aſked him if he did not remember ſaving his life. "Yes," anſwered the aged and loyal Curate of Cunnington, "I do, but I "wiſh I had put you in, rather than ſee you in arms "againſt the king (324)."

(324) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 92—94.

As is uſual with regard to extraordinary perſons and characters, ſeveral circumſtances are given relating to Oliver, which were ſuppoſed to have been prognoſtications of future greatneſs. There is a tradition at Huntingdon, that when King Charles the firſt, then Duke of York, in his journey from Scotland to London, in the year 1604, called at Hinchinbrooke, the ſeat of Sir Oliver Cromwell; that Knight, to divert the young Prince, ſent for his nephew Oliver, that he, together with his own ſons, might play with his Royal Highneſs. They had not, however, been long together, before Charles and Oliver diſagreed; and, as the former was then as weakly as the latter was ſtrong, the Royal Viſitant was worſted. So little was dignity regarded by Oliver, even at that early age, that he made the blood flow in copious ſtreams from the Prince's noſe: and agreeably to the ſuperſtition of the times, it is ſaid that this event was looked upon as a bad preſage for the King, at the commencement of the civil wars. It is acknowledged by Mr. Noble, that he gives the ſtory as only the report of the Town; but he obſerves, that thus far is certain, that Hinchinbrooke, as being near to Huntingdon, was generally one of the reſting places of any of the Royal Family when going to, or returning from the North of England, either into, or from Scotland. It is more certain, adds Mr. Noble, that Oliver averred, that he ſaw a gigantic figure which came and opened the curtains of his bed, and told him that he ſhould be the greateſt perſon in the kingdom. If it be true that Oliver often mentioned this viſion when he was in the height of his glory, it is undoubtedly a proof of the warmth of his imagination, and of his early ambition (325).

(325) Ibid. p. 94, 95.

Very different accounts are given of the improvements which were made by Cromwell during the courſe of his education. According to Hume, when he was at College, his genius was little fitted for the calm and elegant occupations of learning, and conſequently he made ſmall proficiency in his ſtudies; and Sir William Dugdale's character of him, during his reſidence at the Univerſity, is ſtill more unfavourable. But the aſſertions of partial writers are to be admitted with caution. Though it is far from being improbable that he was fonder of active amuſements, than of literature, it is, nevertheleſs, certain, that, inſtead of totally neglecting his ſtudies, his Tutor, by diſcovering the bent of his diſpoſition, had addreſs ſufficient to perſuade him to become a proficient in the Latin language. Mr. Waller aſſures us, that he had a good knowledge of the Greek and Roman hiſtories: nor muſt it be forgotten, that he patronized men of ſcience and learning. Dr. Manton ſays, that he had a very valuable and well-choſen library. From all theſe circumſtances it may be collected, that he was not averſe to literature, or without a competent ſhare of it himſelf, if allowance be made for the ſhort time he remained at College; his mother having found it expedient, upon his father's deceaſe, to remove him from the Univerſity. Perhaps his extravagant turn might lead her to ſuch a reſolution. Be that as it may, it is a real fact that he always retained a regard for the Univerſity of Cambridge (326).

(326) Ibid. p. 95, 96.

During Cromwell's reſidence at Lincoln's Inn, and after his return home, very unfavourable accounts are given, by various writers, of his character and conduct. In London, inſtead of attending to Coke upon Littleton, and to law reports, his mind was engroſſed by diſſolute pleaſures, and he was particularly addicted to gaming. When he came back to Huntingdon, he purſued his vicious courſes, and, if his enemies are to be credited, in a manner that was extremely groſs and illiberal. His rude and boiſterous behaviour prevented his equals from conſorting with him; and, therefore, he was obliged to take up with leſs creditable companions; who, if they did not adopt his ſentiments, were ſure to feel the weight of his arm, and to receive a ſevere diſcipline from his uſual weapon, a quarter ſtaff. This conduct, together with his forgetting to pay his reckoning, rendered him an unwelcome viſitor, even to the publicans; by whom he was ſo dreaded, that when they ſaw him coming, they would ſay, "here comes young Cromwell, ſhut up your doors." If at any time they complained of hard uſage, becauſe their accounts were not ſettled, the ſatisfaction they received was that of having their windows broken (327).

(327) Ibid. p. 97, 98.

That there is ſome exaggeration in theſe narratives, can ſcarcely be doubted. But whatever may have been the caſe in this reſpect, it is certain that Oliver's career of extravagance did not continue long. Before he became of age, he began to feel a compunction for the crimes he had committed, and determined to correct his manners; nor was any doubt entertained of the reality of his reformation. When his marriage took place, he had but juſt completed his twenty-firſt year; and, if ever he had forfeited the eſteem of his own townſmen, he recovered it ſo entirely, that, in 1625, he was returned one of the Members for the Borough of Huntingdon. This was in the firſt Parliament of Charles the Firſt's reign. However, about this time, Cromwell took a ſtep, which indicated, in a ſtriking manner, the boldneſs of his diſpoſition. His fortune being ſmall, he endeavoured to repair it by procuring that the eſtate of his maternal uncle, Sir Thomas Stuart, ſhould be annexed to his own, in the life-time of Sir Thomas. For this purpoſe, he repreſented him as a perſon not able to govern it, and by petition to his Majeſty, applied for a Commiſſion of Lunacy. The petition, upon being heard, was diſmiſſed by the King as groundleſs. Sir Thomas Stuart, as might naturally be expected, was extremely offended with this tranſaction: nevertheleſs, in conſequence of the intreaties of Oliver's mother, and Sir Oliver Cromwell, and through the good offices of ſome of the neighbouring clergy, he was induced to forgive the injury, and, in the end, as hath appeared in the article, left his eſtate to his nephew (328). It is highly probable, that, on ſuch an occaſion, Cromwell would exert all his arts of duplicity, tears, and the moſt ſolemn proteſtations of repentance.

(328) Ibid. p. 100.

One of the effects proceeding from the reformation of his manners, was his willingneſs to return ſuch ſums of money as he had won by gaming. Having accidentally met a Mr. Calton, who had formerly loſt to him thirty pounds, he immediately repaid it, ſaying that he had obtained it in an unlawful way, and therefore could not, without ſinning, detain it any longer.

longer. It is related, that when he reſided in London, he had won ſome money from Mr. Robert Compton, a genteel youth, the ſon of a tradeſman in the city. This having been procured by unfair play, Oliver determined to make reſtitution, which happened to be done at a very convenient ſeaſon: for the meſſenger ſent by him found Mr. Compton at an ordinary, ſurrounded by Bailiffs, who wanted to arreſt him for a debt of twenty pounds. But, by this happy ſupply, he was not only enabled to diſcharge the debt, but carried away with him a hundred pounds more. How far this ſtory is founded in fact, cannot now, perhaps, be abſolutely aſcertained. It occurs in a manuſcript book that was written by a Dr. Hutton (328).

(328) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 105, 106.

The ſubſequent conduct of Cromwell is related, at large, in the article of our predeceſſor; and, therefore, it is not neceſſary for us to expatiate on that ſubject. Indeed the public acts of Oliver form a moſt diſtinguiſhed part of the general hiſtory of the times; and on this head we might refer to a great number of writers whoſe works have appeared ſince the firſt edition of the Biographia Britannica. Not to mention authors of ſmaller note; Guthrie, Carte, Hume, Smollett, and Mrs. Macaulay, may now be added to the Catalogue of Hiſtorians by whom the tranſactions of Cromwell are amply diſplayed. The facts, however, muſt always be the ſame, though diverſified by the different ſentiments and reflections of the writers. Amongſt other publications, the Parliamentary Hiſtory is, perhaps, the work of the greateſt conſequence. It excels, as from its title and deſign might be expected, in giving a full relation of every thing that was tranſacted by Oliver's Parliaments, and in ſtating his whole conduct with regard to thoſe aſſemblies. Very conſiderable light is alſo thrown on other parts of his political life. To enter into a detail of whatever occurs with reſpect to him in the Parliamentary Hiſtory, would evidently carry us beyond all the bounds of this note; and, therefore, we ſhall content ourſelves with tranſcribing only one important paſſage, originally taken from Whitlocke, becauſe it tends to diſcriminate Cromwell's character in a point that has often been miſunderſtood. It is well known that his ſpeeches were frequently ſo obſcure, confuſed, and embaraſſed, that the meaning of them could with difficulty, if at all, be comprehended. But it is probable that, in theſe caſes, he acted from the deſign of concealing his real purpoſes from the perſons with whom he converſed. When it ſuited his views, he could expreſs himſelf as clearly as any man. Of this we have a remarkable inſtance, in the dialogue which, in 1652, paſſed between him and Whitlocke, upon the grand queſtion, whether any meaſures could be diſcovered for ſettling the diſtractions of the nation, but by the diſſolution of Parliament and the reſtoration of the Monarchy; and how far it would be ſafe for Cromwell, in ſuch a caſe, to take the Crown upon himſelf. This dialogue ſo fully illuſtrates the perſpicuity of language he was capable of adopting, and is otherwiſe ſo important by the diſplay of his character, that our readers, we are perſuaded, will not object to its length. It ſhall be given, therefore, at large, in Whitlocke's own words.

" Cromwell. My Lord Whitlocke, I know your faithfulneſs and engagement in the ſame good cauſe with myſelf and the reſt of our friends, and I know your ability in judgment, and your particular friendſhip and affection for me: indeed I am ſufficiently ſatisfied in theſe things, and therefore I deſire to adviſe with you in the main and moſt important affairs relating to our preſent condition.

" Whitlocke. Your Excellency hath known me long, and I think will ſay that you never knew any unfaithfulneſs or breach of truſt by me; and for my particular affection to your perſon, your favours to me, and your public ſervices, have deſerved more than I can manifeſt: only there is, with your favour, a miſtake in this one thing, touching my weak judgment, which is uncapable to do any conſiderable ſervice for yourſelf or this Commonwealth: yet, to the utmoſt of my power, I ſhall be ready to ſerve you, and that with all diligence and faithfulneſs.

" Cromwell. I have cauſe to be, and am, without the leaſt ſcruple of your faithfulneſs, and I know your kindneſs to me your old friend, and your abilities to ſerve the Commonwealth, and there are enough beſides me that can teſtify it: and I believe our engagements for this Commonwealth have been, and are, as deep as moſt men's; and there never was more need of advice, and ſolid hearty counſel, than the preſent ſtate of our affairs doth require.

" Whitlocke. I ſuppoſe no man will mention his particular engagement in this cauſe, at the ſame time when your Excellency's engagement is remembered: yet to my capacity, and in my ſtation, few men have engaged further than I have done; and that (beſides the goodneſs of your own nature and perſonal knowledge of me) will keep you from any jealouſy of my faithfulneſs.

" Cromwell. I wiſh there were no more ground of ſuſpicion of others, than of you. I can truſt you with my life, and the moſt ſecret matters relating to our buſineſs; and to that end I have now deſired a little private diſcourſe with you; and really, my Lord, there is very great cauſe for us to conſider the dangerous condition we are all in, and how to make good our ſtation, to improve the mercies and ſucceſſes which God hath given us; and not to be fooled out of them again, nor to be broken in pieces, by our particular jarrings and animoſities one againſt another; but to unite our counſels, and hands and hearts, to make good what we have ſo dearly bought, with ſo much hazard, blood, and Treaſure; and that, the Lord having given us an intire conqueſt over our enemies, we ſhould not now hazard all again by our private janglings, and bring thoſe miſchiefs upon ourſelves, which our enemies could never do.

" Whitlocke. My Lord, I look upon our preſent danger as greater than ever it was in the field, and (as your Excellency truly obſerves) our proneneſs to deſtroy ourſelves, when our enemies could not do it. It is no ſtrange thing for a gallant army, as yours is, after full conqueſt of their enemies, to grow into factions and ambitious deſigns; and it is a wonder to me that they are not in high mutinies, their ſpirits being active, and few thinking their ſervices to be duly rewarded; and the emulation of the officers breaking out daily more and more, in this time of their vacancy from their employment. Beſides, the private ſoldiers, it may be feared, will, in this time of their idleneſs, grow into diſorder; and it is your excellent conduct which, under God, hath kept them ſo long in diſcipline, and free from mutinies.

" Cromwell. I have uſed, and ſhall uſe, the utmoſt of my poor endeavours to keep them all in order and obedience.

" Whitlocke. Your Excellency hath done it hitherto even to admiration.

" Cromwell. Truly God hath bleſſed me in it exceedingly, and I hope will do ſo ſtill. Your Lordſhip hath obſerved moſt truly the inclinations of the officers of the army to particular factions, and to murmurings that they are not rewarded according to their deſerts; that others, who have adventured leaſt, have gained moſt; and they have neither profit, nor preferment, nor place in government, which others hold, who have undergone no hardſhips nor hazards for the Commonwealth; and herein they have too much of truth: yet their inſolency is very great, and their influence upon the private ſoldiers works them to the like diſcontents and murmurings.

Then as for the Members of Parliament, the army begins to have a ſtrange diſtaſte againſt them, and I wiſh there were not too much cauſe for it: and really their pride, and ambition, and ſelf-ſeeking, ingroſſing all places of honour and profit to themſelves and their friends, and their daily breaking forth into new and violent parties and factions; their delays of buſineſs, and deſigns to perpetuate themſelves, and to continue the power in their own hands; their meddling in private matters between party and party, contrary to the inſtitution of parliaments, and their injuſtice and partiality in thoſe matters, and the ſcandalous lives of ſome of the chief of them; theſe things, my Lord, do give too much ground for people to open their mouths againſt them, and to diſlike them. Nor can they be kept within the bounds of juſtice, law, or reaſon; they themſelves being the ſupreme ſupreme power of the nation, liable to no account to any, nor to be controuled or regulated by any other power, there being none ſuperior, or co-ordinate with them: ſo that, unleſs there be ſome authority and power ſo full and ſo high as to reſtrain and keep things in better order, and that may be a check to theſe exorbitancies, it will be impoſſible, in human reaſon, to prevent our ruin.

" Whitlocke. I confeſs the danger we are in by theſe extravagancies and inordinate powers is more than I doubt is generally apprehended: yet as to that part of it which concerns the ſoldiery, your Excellency's power and commiſſion is ſufficient already to reſtrain and keep them in their due obedience; and, bleſſed be God, you have done it hitherto, and I doubt not but, by your wiſdom, you will be able ſtill to do it.

" As to the Members of Parliament, I confeſs the greateſt difficulty lies there; your commiſſion being from them, and they being acknowledged the ſupreme power of the nation, ſubject to no controuls, nor allowing any appeal from them: yet I am ſure your Excellency will not look upon them as generally depraved. Too many of them are much to blame in thoſe things you have mentioned, and many unfit things have paſſed among them; but I hope well of the major part of them, when great matters come to a deciſion.

" Cromwell. My Lord, there is little hopes of a good ſettlement to be made by them, really there is not; but a great deal of fear, that they will deſtroy again what the Lord hath done graciouſly for them and us: we all forget God, and God will forget us, and give us up to confuſion; and theſe men will help it on, if they be ſuffered to proceed in their ways. Some courſe muſt be thought on to curb and reſtrain them, or we ſhall be ruined by them.

" Whitlocke. We ourſelves have acknowledged them the ſupreme power, and taken our commiſſions and authority in the higheſt concernments from them; and how to reſtrain and curb them after this, it will be hard to find out a way for it.

" Cromwell. What if a man ſhould take upon him to be King?

" Whitlocke. I think that remedy would be worſe than the diſeaſe.

" Cromwell. Why do you think ſo?

" Whitlocke. As to your own perſon the title of King would be of no advantage, becauſe you have the full kingly power in you already, concerning the militia, as you are General. As to the nomination of civil officers, thoſe whom you think fitteſt are ſeldom refuſed; and although you have no negative vote in the paſſing of laws, yet what you diſlike will not eaſily be carried; and the taxes are already ſettled, and in your power to diſpoſe the money raiſed. And as to foreign affairs, though the ceremonial application be made to the Parliament, yet the expectation of good or bad ſucceſs in it is from your excellency; and particular ſolicitations of foreign miniſters are made to you only: ſo that I apprehend, indeed, leſs envy and danger, and pomp, but not leſs power, and real opportunities of doing good in your being General, than would be if you had aſſumed the title of King.

" Cromwell. I have heard ſome of your profeſſion obſerve, that he who is actually King, whether by election or by deſcent, yet being once King, all acts done by him as King are as lawful and juſtifiable as by any King who hath the crown by inheritance from his forefathers: and that by an act of Parliament in Henry the Seventh's time, it is ſafer for thoſe who act under a King, be his title what it will, than for thoſe who act under any other power. And ſurely the power of a King is ſo great and high, and ſo univerſally underſtood and reverenced by the people of this nation, that the title of it might not only indemnify, in a great meaſure, thoſe that act under it, but likewiſe be of great uſe and advantage in ſuch times as theſe, to curb the inſolences of thoſe whom the preſent powers cannot controul, or at leaſt are the perſons themſelves who are thus inſolent.

" Whitlocke. I agree in the general what you are pleaſed to obſerve as to this title of King: but whether for your Excellency to take this title upon you, as things now are, will be for the good and advantage either of yourſelf and friends, or of the Commonwealth, I do very much doubt; notwithſtanding that act of Parliament, 11 Henry VII. which will be little regarded, or obſerved to us by our enemies, if they ſhould come to get the upper hand of us.

" Cromwell. What do you apprehend would be the danger of taking this title?

" Whitlocke. The danger, I think, would be this: one of the main points of controverſy betwixt us and our adverſaries is, whether the Government of this nation ſhall be eſtabliſhed in Monarchy, or in a Free State or Commonwealth; and moſt of our friends have engaged with us upon the hopes of having the Government ſettled in a Free State, and to effect that have undergone all their hazards and difficulties, they being perſuaded, though I think much miſtaken, that under the government of a Commonwealth they ſhall enjoy more liberty and right, both as to their ſpiritual and civil concernments, than they ſhall under Monarchy; the preſſures and diſlike whereof are ſo freſh in their memories and ſufferings.

" Now if your Excellency ſhould take upon you the title of King, this ſtate of your cauſe will be thereby wholly determined, and monarchy eſtabliſhed in your perſon; and the queſtion will be no more whether our Government ſhall be by a Monarch, or by a Free State, but whether Cromwell or Stuart ſhall be our King and Monarch.

" And that queſtion, wherein before ſo great parties of the nation were engaged, and which was univerſal, will by this means become, in effect, a private controverſy only. Before it was national, what kind of government we ſhould have: now it will become particular, who ſhall be our Governor, whether of the family of the Stuarts, or of the family of the Cromwells?

" Thus the ſtate of our controverſy being totally changed, all thoſe who were for a Commonwealth (and they are a very great and conſiderable party) having their hopes therein fruſtrated, will deſert you; your hands will be weakened, your intereſt ſtraitened, and your cauſe in apparent danger to be ruined.

" Cromwell. I confeſs you ſpeak reaſon in this: but what other thing can you propound that may obviate the preſent dangers and difficulties wherein we are all engaged?

" Whitlocke. It will be the greateſt difficulty to find out ſuch an expedient. I have had many things in my private thoughts upon this buſineſs, ſome of which perhaps are not fit, or ſafe, for me to communicate.

" Cromwell. I pray, my Lord, what are they? You may truſt me with them; there ſhall no prejudice come to you by any private diſcourſe betwixt us; I ſhall never betray my friend; you may be as free with me as with your own heart, and ſhall never ſuffer by it.

" Whitlocke. I make no ſcruple to put my life and fortune into your Excellency's hand; and ſo I ſhall, if I impart theſe fancies to you, which are weak, and perhaps may prove offenſive to your Excellency; therefore my beſt way will be to ſmother them.

" Cromwell. Nay, I prithee, my Lord Whitlocke, let me know them. Be they what they will they cannot be offenſive to me, but I ſhall take it kindly from you: therefore, I pray, do not conceal thoſe thoughts of yours from your faithful friend.

" Whitlocke. Your Excellency honours me with a title far above me; and ſince you are pleaſed to command it, I ſhall diſcover to you my thoughts herein; and humbly deſire you not to take in ill part what I ſhall ſay to you.

" Cromwell. Indeed I ſhall not; but I ſhall take it, as I ſaid, very kindly from you.

" Whitlocke. Give me leave then, firſt, to conſider your Excellency's condition. You are invironed with ſecret enemies: upon your ſubduing of the public enemy, the officers of your army account themſelves all victors, and to have had an equal ſhare in the conqueſt with you.

" The ſucceſs which God hath given us hath not a little elated their minds; and many of them are buſy and and of turbulent ſpirits, and are not without their deſigns how they may diſmount your Excellency, and ſome of themſelves get up into the ſaddle; how they may bring you down, and ſet up themſelves.

" They want not counſel and encouragement herein; it may be from ſome Members of the Parliament, who may be jealous of your power and greatneſs, leſt you ſhould grow too high for them, and in time overmaſter them; and they will plot to bring you down firſt, or to clip your wings.

" Cromwell. I thank you that you ſo fully conſider my condition; it is a teſtimony of your love to me, and care of me, and you have rightly conſidered it; and I may ſay without vanity, that in my condition yours is involved and all our friends; and thoſe that plot my ruin will hardly bear your continuance in any condition worthy of you. Beſides this, the cauſe itſelf may poſſibly receive ſome diſadvantage by the ſtrugglings and contentions among ourſelves. But what, Sir, are your thoughts for prevention of thoſe miſchiefs that hang over our heads?

" Whitlocke. Pardon me, Sir, in the next place, a little to conſider the condition of the King of Scots.

" This Prince being now by your valour, and the ſucceſs which God hath given to the Parliament, and to the Army under your Command, reduced to a very low condition; both he and all about him cannot but be very inclineable to hearken to any terms, whereby their loſt hopes may be revived of his being reſtored to the Crown, and they to their fortunes and native country.

" By a private Treaty with him you may ſecure yourſelf, and your friends and their fortunes; you may make yourſelf and your poſterity as great and permanent, to all human probability, as ever any ſubject was, and provide for your friends. You may put ſuch limits to Monarchical power, as will ſecure our ſpiritual and civil liberties, and you may ſecure the cauſe in which we are all engaged; and this may be effectually done, by having the power of the militia continued in yourſelf, and whom you ſhall agree upon after you.

" I propound, therefore, for your Excellency to ſend to the King of Scots, and to have a private treaty with him for this purpoſe; and I beſeech you to pardon what I have ſaid upon the occaſion. It is out of my affection and ſervice to your Excellency, and to all honeſt men; and I humbly pray you not to have any jealouſy thereupon of my approved faithfulneſs to your Excellency and to this Commonwealth.

" Cromwell. I have not, I aſſure you, the leaſt diſtruſt of your faithfulneſs and friendſhip to me, and to the cauſe of this Commonwealth; and I think you have much reaſon for what you propound; but it is a matter of ſo high importance and difficulty, that it deſerves more time of conſideration and debate than is at preſent allowed us: we ſhall therefore take a further time to diſcourſe of it (329)."

(329) Parliamentary Hiſtory, vol. xx. p. 104—112.

Another work, of ſome conſideration, which has appeared ſince our Predeceſſor's article was written, is Dr. William Harris's " Hiſtorical and Critical Account of the Life of Oliver Cromwell." This work, which is drawn up with great induſtry, beſides comprehending a variety of extracts from a number of authors, is enriched with an appendix of original papers. Among other things, it contains a number of Cromwell's Letters never before publiſhed, and which are produced as proofs of the ſincerity of his religious diſpoſitions and profeſſions, at leaſt, in the early part of his life. Dr. Harris, however, though more prejudiced in favour of Oliver than became ſuch a zealous Advocate for Liberty, is obliged to record ſeveral inſtances of his ſhameful hypocriſy and diſſimulation. One anecdote of this kind, related by Biſhop Burnet, on the authority of Sir Harbottle Grimſtone, is ſo ſtriking, that it deſerves to be tranſcribed.

" When the Houſe of Commons and the Army were a quarrelling, at a meeting of the officers, it was propoſed to purge the army better, that they might know whom to depend on. Cromwell upon that ſaid, he was ſure of the army; but there was another body that had more need of purging, naming the Houſe of Commons, and he thought the army only could do that. Two officers that were preſent brought an account of this to Grimſton, who carried them with him to the Lobby of the Houſe of Commons, they being reſolved to juſtify it to the Houſe. There was another debate then on foot: but Grimſton diverted it, and ſaid, he had a matter of privilege of the higheſt ſort to lay before them: it was about the being and freedom of the houſe. So he charged Cromwell with the deſign of putting a force on the Houſe: he had his witneſſes at the door, and deſired they might be examined: they were brought to the bar, and juſtified all that they had ſaid to him, and gave a full relation of all that had paſſed at their meetings. When they withdrew, Cromwell fell down on his knees, and made a ſolemn prayer to God, atteſting his innocence, and his zeal for the ſervice of the Houſe: he ſubmitted himſelf to the Providence of God, who it ſeems thought fit to exerciſe him with calumny and ſlander, but he committed his cauſe to him: this he did with great vehemence, and with many tears. After this ſtrange and bold preamble he made ſo long a ſpeech, juſtifying both himſelf and the reſt of the officers, except a few that ſeemed inclined to return back to Egypt, that he wearied out the Houſe, and wrought ſo much on his party, that what the witneſſes had ſaid was ſo little believed, that had it been moved, Grimſton thought that both he and they would have been ſent to the Tower. But whether their guilt made them modeſt, or that they had no mind to have the matter much talked of, they let it fall: and there was no ſtrength on the other ſide to carry it farther. To complete the ſcene, as ſoon as ever Cromwell got out of the Houſe, he reſolved to truſt himſelf no more among them; but went to the Army, and in a few days he brought them up, and forced a great many from the Houſe (330)."

Additions to the ſtock of letters written by Cromwell, have ſince been made in other publications. Particularly to recite them is needleſs. They will be found in Noble's Memoirs; in the letters that paſſed between Colonel Robert Hammond, Governor of the Iſle of Wight, and the Committee of Lords and Commons at Derby-Houſe; and the fourth volume of the Annual Regiſter. All of them concur in giving ſome inſight into the character and views of Oliver, with regard to the particular objects to which they relate. In the Gentleman's Magazine, for 1781, is a tranſcript of a valuable record, containing Cromwell's protection to divers Engliſh ſhips to trade to India and Perſia. The original, which is on parchment, is beautifully illuminated, with the arms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, at the top. On one ſide is an excellent portrait of Oliver within the O; under which is a large ſhip, finely drawn, with the arms of England on the main-maſt. This curious deed, which is dated on the twenty-ninth day of March, 1655, and diſplays Cromwell's attention to the promotion of Commerce, is in the collection of John Thorpe, Eſq; of Bexley in Kent, and Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries (331).

" I have ſometimes thought," ſays an ingenious correſpondent, " that an agreeable hiſtory enough " might be made of Cromwell without one word of " truth in it, excepting a few public tranſactions, and " all taken from hiſtorians." The truth of this remark has already been illuſtrated in note [B], with regard to the work of Gregorio Leti; and it might farther be confirmed with reſpect to Voltaire, who has fallen into many errors, in what he relates concerning Oliver. Indeed, this celebrated writer was far from being well informed in the affairs of England.

In the Richardſoniana, are two anecdotes concerning Cromwell, for the authenticity of which we have no other evidence than the book whence they are taken. The firſt is produced, by Mr. Richardſon, as a proof of Oliver's greatneſs of mind, and juſtneſs of thinking; though expreſſed in a rude manner, ſuitable to the ſubject and to himſelf. On account of the vulgarity of the ſtory, we have heſitated concerning the propriety of inſerting it: but if it ſhould be thought to reflect ſome honour on the character of the Protector, we ſhall obtain the pardon of, at leaſt, a part of our readers. The ſtory is as follows: " A zealous officer of his came to him, and told him he had had fallen into bad company, where he had had the mortification to hear his Highneſs ſpoken of in a very ſcandalous manner. "Ay, ſays he, man, what did they ſay?" "I am aſhamed, an't pleaſe your Highneſs, to repeat it." "Tell, tell," ſays Oliver. "Why, an't pleaſe your Highneſs, a raſcal had the impudence to ſay, your Highneſs might kiſs his a——." "How, how! what was he for a man?" "Oh! ſays the officer, he was but a poor beggarly fellow." "Oho! ſays the Protector, when you ſee him again, tell him, he may kiſs mine."

The other anecdote, though very aukwardly related, we ſhall give in Mr. Richardſon's own words. "Lord Bolingbroke told us (June 12, 1742) that Lord Oxford had often told him, that he had ſeen, and had in his hand, a letter that King Charles the Firſt wrote to the Queen in anſwer to one of hers that had been intercepted, and then forwarded to him; wherein ſhe reproached him for "having made thoſe villains too great conceſſions" (viz. that Cromwell ſhould be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for life, without account; that that kingdom ſhould be in the hands of the party with an army there kept, which ſhould know no head but the Lieutenant; that Cromwell ſhould have a Garter, &c.) that in this letter of the King's, it was ſaid, that ſhe ſhould leave him to manage, who was better informed of all circumſtances than ſhe could be; but that ſhe might be entirely eaſy as to whatever conceſſions he ſhould make them; for that he ſhould know in due time, how to deal with the rogues, who, inſtead of a ſilken Garter, ſhould be fitted with an hempen cord." So the letter ended; which anſwer, as they waited for, ſo they intercepted accordingly, and it determined his fate. This letter Lord Oxford ſaid he had offered 500l. for. Lord Bolingbroke, Lord Marchment, and Mr. P——e, all believed that a ſtory I had heard or read to this purpoſe (and which occaſioned Lord Bolingbroke's telling the above) had its origin no higher than this ſtory of Lord Oxford (332)."

(332) Richardſoniana, p 129*. 132*, 133*.

Mr. Gilpin, in his elegant and entertaining obſervations on pictureſque beauty, has given a ſtory which, in point of cruelty, reflects a deep diſgrace on Oliver's conduct. "In the time of the civil wars, the owner "of this Manſion [Norton Conyers, near Rippon in Yorkſhire] "was Sir Richard Graham, of whom we "heard an anecdote in the family, which is worth "relating; as it is not only curious in itſelf, but "throws a very ſtrong, but dark ſhade on the cha-"racter of Cromwell. When the affairs of Charles "the Firſt were in the wane in all the ſouthern "counties, the Marquis of Newcaſtle's prudence "gave them ſome credit in the North. His reſi-"dence was at York, where he engaged two of the "Gentlemen of the country to act under him as "Lieutenants. Sir Richard Graham was one; "whoſe commiſſion under the Marquis is ſtill in the "hands of the family. As Sir Richard was both an "active man, and much attached to the Royal cauſe, "he entered into it with all that vigour, which abi-"lity, inſpired by inclination, could exert; and did "the King more effectual ſervice, than perhaps any "private Gentleman in thoſe parts. On that fatal "day, when the precipitancy of Prince Rupert, in "oppoſition to the ſage advice of the Marquis, led "the King's forces out of York againſt Cromwell, "who waited for them on Marſden Moor, Sir Ri-"chard Graham had a principal command, and no "man did more than he, to end an action with ſuc-"ceſs, which had been undertaken with temerity. "When the day was irretrievably loſt, and nothing "remained, but for every man to ſeek the beſt "means of ſecurity that offered, Sir Richard fled, "with twenty-ſix bleeding wounds upon him, to his "houſe at Norton Conyers, about fifteen miles from "the field. Here he arrived in the evening, and "being ſpent with loſs of blood, and fatigue, he was "carried into his chamber; where, taking the laſt "farewell of his diſconſolate Lady, he expired. "Cromwell, who had ever expreſſed a peculiar in-"veteracy againſt this Gentleman, and thought a "victory only half obtained, if he eſcaped, purſued "his flight in perſon, with a troop of horſe. When "he arrived at Norton, his gallant enemy was dead; "having ſcarce lived an hour after he was carried into "his chamber: and Cromwell found his wretched "Lady weeping over the mangled corpſe of her "huſband, yet ſcarce cold. Such a ſight, one "would have imagined, might have given him—not "indeed an emotion of pity—but a ſatiety of re-"venge. The inhuman miſcreant ſtill feeling the "vengeance of his ſoul unſatisfied; and turning "round to his troopers, who had ſtalked with him "into the ſacred receſſes of ſorrow, he gave the ſign "of havoc; and in a few moments the whole houſe "was torn in pieces. Not even the bed was ſpared, "on which the mangled body was extended; and "every thing was deſtroyed, which the hand of ra-"pine could not carry off (333)."

(333) Obſervations chiefly relative to pictureſque Beauty, made in the Year 1772, on ſeveral Parts of England, particularly the Mountains and Lakes of Cumberland and Weſtmore and, P. 199—201.

Were ſcepticiſm to put its finger on this narrative, perhaps it would ſuggeſt, that traditional ſtories gather ſtrength and circumſtance from time; that hiſtory is ſilent with regard to Sir Richard Graham's having had a principal command at the battle of Marſton Moor; that he could not arrive at Norton-Conyers in the evening, ſince it was not till ſeven o'clock in the evening that the battle commenced, which laſted three hours; that the account of his having twenty-ſix bleeding wounds upon him has a romantic aſpect; that it is difficult to know why Cromwell ſhould have always expreſſed a peculiar inveteracy to Sir Richard, becauſe from their remoteneſs of ſituation, there could not well have been an ancient enmity between them; and that it is ſomewhat extraordinary that Oliver, who had been at the head of the left wing of the Parliamentary army, ſhould quit all other duties, and engage in a purſuit of fifteen miles, for the ſake of gratifying his revenge on a ſingle Gentleman.

Among the inſtances which the Protector's Biographers have recorded of the encouragement given by him to the cauſe of literature, what he did with regard to Durham has been but ſlightly mentioned. In 1650, a Petition to Parliament, from ſeveral perſons of fortune in that county, was delivered by the Grand Jury to the High Sheriff, praying, that the College and Houſes of the Dean and Chapter, then empty and going to decay, might be employed for erecting a College, School, or Academy, for the benefit of the Northern counties, which were ſo far diſtant from the Univerſities; and that part of the lands of the ſaid Dean and Chapter, near the city, might be applied by Truſtees to pious uſes. This Petition having been ſtrongly recommended by Oliver, in a letter dated from Edinburgh, to William Lenthall, Eſq; Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, another application to the ſame purpoſe was made in 1651. Theſe applications being referred to a Committee, to ſtate the buſineſs, and to report their opinion concerning the deſires of the county, the Committee accordingly reported, that they were of opinion, that the ſaid houſes were a fit place to erect a College or School for all the Sciences and Literature; and that it would be a pious and laudable work, and of great uſe to the Northern parts. There being now a proſpect of ſucceſs in the deſign, a warm and affectionate addreſs upon the occaſion, was preſented, in 1653, from the principal Gentlemen of the county, to his Excellency the Lord General, and the reſt of his Council of Officers. The buſineſs, however, was not effectually proſecuted till 1656. In that year, Cromwell and his Council iſſued an order for founding and endowing a College at Durham, out of the Church lands; and on the fifteenth of May, 1657, Letters Patent were granted for that purpoſe. By theſe letters it was ordained, that the College ſhould conſiſt of one Provoſt or Maſter, two Preachers or Senior Fellows, and twelve other Fellows; four of the ſaid twelve Fellows to be Profeſſors, four others to be Tutors, and other four of them to be Schoolmaſters. There were alſo to be in the ſaid College twenty-four Scholars and twelve Exhibitioners, and in the Free School belonging to it eighteen Scholars. Philip Hutton, M. A. was appointed to be the firſt Provoſt or Maſter; William Spinedge, and Joſeph Hill, M. A. the two firſt Preachers, or Senior Fellows; and Thomas Vaughan, M. A. John Kiſler, M. D. Robert Wood, M. A. Ezerel Tong, D. D. John Peachil, M. A. Leonard Waſtel, Richard Ruſſell, M. A. John Richel, Nathanael Vincent, M. A. William Corker, John Doughty, M. A.

and William Sprigg, the firſt twelve other Fellows. Of theſe, Vaughan, Kiſler, Wood and Peachil were conſtituted the four Profeſſors; Tong, Ruſſell, Richel and Doughty the four Tutors; and Vincent, Corker, Sprigge and Waſtel the four Schoolmaſters. It was farther ordained that theſe perſons and their ſucceſſors ſhould ſtand and be incorporated and founded one body politic and corporate, to all intents and purpoſes; and that they ſhould for ever hereafter be called by the name of the Maſter or Provoſt, Fellows and Scholars of the College of Durham, of the Foundation of Oliver Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland and the Dominions thereunto belonging. Large grants were made to the inſtitution; a Common Seal was allowed to it; and the Provoſt, Fellows, and Scholars were empowered to purchaſe, have, hold and enjoy by them and their ſucceſſors, any lands, tenements and hereditaments, rents or revenues, not exceeding the yearly value of ſix thouſand pounds. On the death of Oliver, the Provoſt and Fellows of the College preſented an humble addreſs to the Protector Richard, in which they compared his renowned Father to Auguſtus; and aſſerted, that there were happily conjoined in him the warlike Proweſs of our fifth Henry, the Prudence of our ſeventh Henry, and the Piety of our ſixth Edward. In him, they add, was fulfilled the ancient wiſh of the Romans at the Inauguration of their Emperors; Sis Auguſto fœlicior, ſis Trajano melior. At the ſame time, they recommend to Richard the new erection, which was left an Orphan ſcarcely bound up in its ſwaddling cloaths; and pray, that by the vital beams of his piteous aſpect, it may be cheriſhed and grow, till it bear much fruit, for the good and happineſs of thoſe parts of the land, in which it was planted by a hand which never miſcarried in any of its humane and magnanimous atchievements. This Orphan College, it is ſaid, thrived apace. It endeavoured to confer degrees, and to mimic its grown upon ſiſters of Oxford and Cambridge. But theſe great and long eſtabliſhed bodies checked ſo preſumptuous a ſpirit, by Petitions to the young Protector, in which they aſſigned their reaſons againſt a third Univerſity, and eſpecially againſt any degrees being conferred there. In leſs than two years, the diſjointed frame of Government, which had haraſſed the kingdom, was diſſolved, and with it fell the new ſeminary of knowledge at Durham (334).

Numerous are the characters of Oliver Cromwell, which have been given both by foreigners and natives. "There met in him, ſays the Biſhop of Meaux, an incredible depth of judgment, a refined hypocriſy, an able policy, a capacity to venture yet conceal all things, a reſolution to leave nothing to chance which he could prevent by counſel or force. On the contrary, he was ſo vigilant and ready in all things, that he never loſt the opportunities which preſented themſelves. In a word, he was one of thoſe reſtleſs and bold ſpirits who ſeem born to overturn the world (335)."

(335) Lord Egmont's, M. S. Biographical Collections.

The celebrated Abbé Raynal in his Hiſtory of the Parliament of England, has drawn the character of Oliver, and has added to it a parallel between him and Montroſe. "Cromwell," the Abbé ſays, "was not one of thoſe men who have appeared unworthy of Empire as ſoon as he arrived at it. He had a genius adapted to all places, all ſeaſons, all buſineſs, all parties, all governments. He was always what he ought to be: at the head of an army, the braveſt; in council, the wiſeſt; in buſineſs, the moſt diligent; in debates, the moſt eloquent; in enterprizes, the moſt active; in devotion, the moſt fanatic; in misfortunes, the moſt firm; in an aſſembly of Divines, the moſt learned; in a conſpiracy, the moſt factious. He never made any miſtake, never let ſlip an opportunity, never left an advantage incomplete, never contented himſelf with being great, when he had it in his power to be very great. Chance and natural temper, which determine the conduct of other men, did not influence the moſt inconſiderable of his actions. Born with an abſolute indifference to all that is praiſe-worthy or blameable, honeſt or diſhoneſt; he never conſidered virtue as virtue, crimes as crimes; he regarded only the relation which one or the other might have to his elevation. This was his idol: he ſacrificed to it his King, his country, his religion; which he would have defended with the ſame zeal, had he had the ſame intereſt in protecting, as in deſtroying them. The ſyſtem of his ambition was conducted with an art, an order, a boldneſs, a ſubtlety, and a firmneſs, of which I believe hiſtory can ſhew no example. All ſects, all ranks, all nations; peace, war, negociations, revolutions, miracles, prophecies; all advanced the fortune of this hypocritical Uſurper. He was a man born to decide the fate of nations, empires, and ages. The ſplendour of his talents hath almoſt made the horrour of his outrages to be forgotten: poſterity at leaſt will queſtion, whether Oliver Cromwell deſerved execration or admiration." This is a highly finiſhed picture, rather than an exact likeneſs. The great qualities of Cromwell are exaggerated; and an Engliſhman will ſmile at Oliver's being repreſented as in debates the moſt eloquent, and in an aſſembly of Divines the moſt learned. Neither is it true that he ſacrificed his religion to his elevation; for what religion he had was hoſtile to the epiſcopal form of Church Government.

The Abbé Raynal's compariſon between Montroſe and Cromwell is as follows: "Theſe celebrated men "fixed the eyes of all Europe upon them. Montroſe had an integrity of heart, which always fixed "him in the intereſt of his king and country; Cromwell a ſuperiority of genius, which gave an air of "equity to the moſt criminal actions. Vanity properly made the character of the firſt; ambition was "the only ruling paſſion of the ſecond. With the "firſt, one had great hopes of conquering; with the "ſecond, one was ſure not to be beaten. If the "Crown could have been kept on Charles's head, it "was by Montroſe: if it muſt fall from it, it muſt "be by Cromwell. The Republican was as much "ſuperior to the Royaliſt in depth of judgment, as "he was inferior to him in goodneſs of heart. In a "word, Cromwell was an illuſtrious villain, who "cannot be praiſed without horrour, nor deſpiſed "without injuſtice; whom we are at once forced to "admire and to deteſt (336)."

(336) Annual Regiſter, vol. ix. p. 88, 89. Monthly Review, vol. v. p. 449, 450.

Several of our later Engliſh authors do not entertain ſo high an opinion of the Protector's abilities as has been done by ſome foreigners. "With reſpect to Cromwell, ſays the Monthly Reviewer, he was undoubtedly ſubtle, a perfect maſter of diſſimulation, active, vigilant, and intrepid. But we cannot diſcover in him thoſe refined marks, or that deep ſyſtem of policy, which ſome writers attribute to his character. He ſeems rather to have been led by a train of accidents to the power he uſurped, than guided to it by a ſeries of deſign. His chief merit was the artifice he employed to raiſe himſelf to the ſole command of the army. When he had gained that point, in a ſtate quite unſettled, and where the Government was upon no legal foundation whatever, it was eaſy for a victorious Commander to change the ſword for the ſceptre. Nay, to an ambitious mind the tranſition was almoſt involuntary. But we are not perſuaded that he planned his ſchemes from a foreſight of events: we rather think that he was taught by the occaſion as it offered. Thus much is certain, that his ſyſtem of foreign politics was, in many reſpects, erroneous in its principles, and narrow in its foundation; and that he conſulted how to gratify his own pride, by raiſing what he called the honour of the nation, while he neglected its intereſt (337)."

(337) Monthly Review, vol. xix. p. 27.

Mr. Hume, likewiſe, while he does juſtice to Oliver's talents, is far from viewing them in that tranſcendent point of light in which they have frequently been repreſented. His character of the Protector is as follows.

"It ſeems to me, that the occurrence of Cromwell's life, where his abilities are principally diſcovered, is his riſing from a private ſtation, in oppoſition to ſo many rivals, ſo much advanced before him, to a high command and authority in the army. His great courage, his ſignal military talents, his eminent dexterity and addreſs, were all requiſite for this important acquiſition. Yet will not this promotion appear the effect of ſupernatural abilities, when we conſider, that

Fairfax,

Fairfax, himſelf a private Gentleman, who had not the advantage of a ſeat in Parliament, had, through the ſame ſteps, attained even a ſuperiour rank, and if endued with common capacity and penetration, had been able to retain it. To incite ſuch an army to rebellion againſt the Parliament, required no uncommon art or induſtry: to have kept them in obedience, had been the more difficult enterprize. When the breach was once formed betwixt the military and civil powers, a ſupreme and abſolute authority, from that moment, is devolved upon the General; and if he is afterwards pleaſed to employ artifice, or policy, it may be regarded, on moſt occaſions, as great condeſcenſion, if not as a ſuperfluous caution. That Cromwell was ever able really to blind, or over-reach, either the King or the Republicans, does not appear. As they poſſeſſed no means of reſiſting the force under his command, they were glad to temporize with him, and, by ſeeming to be deceived, wait for opportunities of freeing themſelves from his dominion. If he ſeduced the military Fanatics, it is to be conſidered, that their intereſt and his evidently concurred, that their ignorance, and low education, expoſed them to the groſſeſt impoſition, and that he himſelf was at bottom as frantic an Enthuſiaſt as the worſt of them; and, in order to obtain their confidence, needed but diſplay thoſe vulgar, and ridiculous habits, which he had early acquired, and on which he ſet ſo high a value. An army is ſo forcible, and, at the ſame time, ſo coarſe a weapon, that any hand which wields it, may, without much dexterity, perform any operation, and attain any aſcendant, in human ſociety.

"The domeſtic adminiſtration of Cromwell, though it diſcovers great ability, was conducted without any plan of liberty or arbitrary power; perhaps, his difficult ſituation admitted of neither. His foreign enterprizes, though full of intrepidity, were pernicious to national intereſt, and ſeem more the reſult of impetuous fury, or narrow prejudices, than of cool foreſight and deliberation. An eminent perſonage, however, he was in many reſpects, and even a ſuperior genius; but unequal and irregular in his operations. And though not defective in any talent, except that of elocution, the abilities, which in him were moſt admirable, and which moſt contributed to his marvellous ſucceſs, were the magnanimous reſolution of his enterprizes, and his peculiar dexterity in diſcovering the characters, and practiſing on the weakneſſes of mankind.

"If we ſurvey the moral character of Cromwell, with that indulgence which is due to the blindneſs and infirmities of the human ſpecies, we ſhall not be inclined to load his memory with ſuch violent reproaches, as thoſe which his enemies uſually throw upon it. Amidſt the paſſion and prejudices of that time, that he ſhould prefer the parliamentary to the royal cauſe, will not appear very extraordinary; ſince, even at preſent, many men of ſenſe and knowledge, are diſpoſed to think, that the queſtion, with regard to the juſtice of the quarrel, may be regarded as very doubtful and ambiguous. The murder of the King, the moſt atrocious of all his actions, was to him covered under a mighty cloud of republican and fanatical illuſions; and it is not impoſſible, that he might believe it, as many others did, the moſt meritorious action which he could perform. His ſubſequent uſurpation was the effect of neceſſity, as well as of ambition; nor is it eaſy to ſee, how the various factions could at that time have been reſtrained, without a mixture of military and arbitrary authority. The private deportment of Cromwell, as a ſon, a huſband, a father, a friend, is expoſed to no conſiderable cenſure, if it does not rather merit praiſe. And, upon the whole, his character does not appear more extraordinary and unuſual, by the mixture of ſo much abſurdity with ſo much penetration, than by his tempering ſuch violent ambition, and ſuch enraged fanaticiſm, with ſo much regard to juſtice and humanity (338)."

Dr. Smollett's character of Cromwell, though ſhort, is drawn up with ability and diſcernment.

"Oliver, ſays the Doctor, was of a robuſt make and conſtitution, and his aſpect was manly, though clowniſh. His education extended no farther than a ſuperficial knowledge of the Latin tongue, but he inherited great talents from nature; though they were ſuch as he could not have exerted to advantage at any other juncture than that of a civil war, inflamed by religious conteſts. His character was formed from an amazing conjunction of enthuſiaſm, hypocriſy, and ambition. He was poſſeſſed of courage and reſolution that overlooked all danger, and ſaw no difficulty. He dived into the characters of mankind with wonderful ſagacity; while he concealed his own purpoſes under the impenetrable ſhield of diſſimulation. He reconciled the moſt attrocious crimes to the moſt rigid notions of religious obligation. From the ſevereſt exerciſe of devotion, he relaxed into the moſt ludicrous and idle buffoonery. He preſerved the dignity and diſtance of his character, in the midſt of the coarſeſt familiarity. He was cruel and tyrannical from policy, juſt and temperate from inclination: perplexed and deſpicable in his diſcourſe; clear and conſummate in his deſigns; ridiculous in his reveries; reſpectable in his conduct: in a word, the ſtrangeſt compound of villainy and virtue, baſeneſs and magnanimity, abſurdity and good ſenſe, that we find upon record in the annals of mankind (339)."

(339) Smollett's Hiſt. of Eng. vol. v. p. 327—329. 3d edit.

Mrs. Macaulay has expoſed the views and conduct of Cromwell with all the ſeverity and ſagacity of a zealous, an impartial, and an enlightened Republican. She has entered deeply into his character, and is of opinion that to his fortune and ſucceſs, more than to his ability, he is indebted for the eulogiums with which he has been loaded by the Engliſh Hiſtorians. Her review of his adminiſtration is clear and ſpirited, and the portrait ſhe has drawn of him is executed with great energy of expreſſion. We ſhall preſent it to our readers.

"The hyperbolical praiſes, ſhe obſerves, beſtowed by his partizans on the unhappy Charles, have been fully refuted by ſeveral pens; but the yet-more-exalted commendations laviſhed on his fortunate ſucceſſor Cromwell, have, from an odd concurrence of circumſtances, met with little contradiction. Did facts allow us to give credit to the exaggerations of panegyriſts, the power and reputation which England acquired by the magnanimous government of the republican Parliament, entirely flowed from the unparalleled genius and virtue of the hero Cromwell: Cromwell imprinted throughout all Europe a terror of the Engliſh name: Cromwell was the conqueror of the Dutch: he retrieved the honour of his country in the buſineſs of Amboyna, and preſcribed a peace to that inſolent republic on his own terms: Cromwell was the ſcourge of the piratical States: the ſcourge of the Houſe of Auſtria; every Court in Europe trembled at his nod; he was the Umpire of the North, the ſupport of the Reformed Religion, and the friend and patron of that warlike Proteſtant Monarch the King of Sweden. In regard to his domeſtic government, Cromwell was ever ready to attend to complaints and redreſs grievances; Cromwell adminiſtered the public affairs with frugality; filled Weſtminſter-hall with judges of learning and integrity; obſerved the ſtricteſt diſcipline in his army; was the ſupport of religious liberty, and a benefactor to the learned: under the adminiſtration of Cromwell every branch of trade flouriſhed: in his Court a face of religion was preſerved, without the appearance of pomp, or needleſs magnificence: he was ſimple in his way of living, and eaſy and modeſt in his deportment.

"Falſe as is this repreſentation to the true character of the Uſurper, it has been adopted by that party among us who call themſelves Whigs, as a mortifying contraſt to the principles, adminiſtration, and conduct of the Stewart line; and the Royaliſts of all denominations are well pleaſed to give to the government of an individual a reputation, which was alone due to the republic, and to conceal from the multitude the truth of facts, which muſt diſcover to vulgar obſervation that eternal oppoſition to the general good of ſociety which exiſts in the one, with the contrary ſpirit which ſo evidently ſhone forth in the other. Hiſtorians, either from prejudice or want of attention, have in general given into theſe ill-founded encomiums ſo prodigally beſtowed on the Uſurper: but a juſt narration of the tranſactions of thoſe times ſhews, that it was under the government of the Parliament the nation gained all its real advantages, and that the maritime power they had raiſed and ſupported, with the ſkill and bravery of the Commanders they had placed over the naval force, was the ſole means by which Cromwell ſupported the reputation of his Government.

"Excepting the Dutch, whom the Parliament had totally ſubdued, with the Danes and Portugueſe, whom they had brought to a ſtate of humiliation, the Uſurper found the Engliſh Commonwealth at peace with all the powers of Europe, and in the ſole poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh trade, a great ſource of national wealth. The Spaniards, who had paid great court to the Parliament, were equally warm in their profeſſions to Cromwell, and would have entered into a cloſe union with him on the eaſy terms of his remaining neuter during their contention with France. This was the plan purſued by the Parliament, and the obvious intereſt of England; but the Uſurper ſacrificing both the glory and the welfare of his country to the ſecurity of his own eſtabliſhment, after having made a ſhameful peace with the Dutch, on terms lower than they had offered and the Parliament had refuſed, he, for the ſake of procuring money to ſupport his deſpotiſm, made war with Spain without previous declaration, whilſt he was amuſing them with the hopes of a treaty; entered into a league offenſive and defenſive with the French Court, on the reaſon of removing his rivals the Stewart family from ſo near a neighbourhood, and to pleaſe the Engliſh fanatics, his only faſt friends, and pamper a vain-glorious appetite by the reputation of being the protector of the Proteſtant intereſt. Could he have brought the Dutch into his deſtructive meaſures, he would have aſſiſted the Swediſh monarch in acquiring a power which would have laid all Europe at the mercy of Sweden and France.

"The domeſtic adminiſtration of the Uſurper was a greater oppoſition to the liberty of his country, than his foreign tranſactions to her ſecurity and intereſt as a ſtate. The models or rules of his government were of his own making; and though he changed them according to his pleaſure or conveniency, he never abided by the directions of any. He ruled entirely by the ſword, burthened the people with the maintenance of an army of thirty-thouſand men, and more groſsly violated their right to legiſlation by their repreſentatives than had any other tyrant who had gone before him. The power he delegated to his Major-generals ſuperſeded the eſtabliſhed laws of the country. He threatened the Judges, and diſmiſſed them from their office when they refuſed to become the inſtruments of his arbitrary will; impriſoned Lawyers for pleading in a legal manner the cauſe of their clients; packed Juries; eluded the redreſs of Habeas Corpus; and kept John Lilbourn in confinement after an acquittance by the verdict of a Jury. In the point of religious liberty, the uſurper, as it ſerved his purpoſes, encouraged and oppreſſed all the different ſectaries, not excepting the Papiſts; and if he was liberal to men of learning, it was with a view to make uſe of their talents for his own peculiar advantage. Some face of decency in his Court, and continuance of that familiarity to his inferiours by which he had effected his ambitious purpoſes, were abſolutely neceſſary to the preſervation of his power; but ſo far was he from preſerving, or even affecting, that ſimplicity of appearance particularly uſeful in a ſupreme governor, that, when only in the character of General of the Army of the Commonwealth, he lived in a kind of regal ſtate at Whitehall. By his parliamentary intereſt, he prevented the ſale of the Royal Palaces, with a view to poſſeſs them when he had compaſſed his intended uſurpation; and that he never appeared in public without an oſtentatious parade and pomp, and lived in high ſtate and magnificence, is confirmed by authentic records, with the teſtimony of all parties. On the diſſolution of the Republican Government, there were five hundred thouſand pounds in the public Treaſury; the value of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds in the magazines; the army was three or four months pay in advance; the maritime power was ſufficiently ſtrong to enable England to give law to all nations; and the trade of the country in ſo flouriſhing a condition that nine hundred thouſand a year had been refuſed for the Cuſtoms and Exciſe. On the death of the Uſurper, notwithſtanding the money he had arbitrarily levied on the people, the aid afforded him by a convention of his own nomination which he termed a Parliament, the vaſt ſums he had raiſed by decimating the cavaliers, the ſums paid by the Dutch, the Portugueſe, and the Duke of Tuſcany, with the treaſure he at different times had taken from the Spaniards, the ſtate was left in debt, the army in arrear, and the fleet in decay! To theſe national evils was added the loſs of a great part of the Spaniſh trade, with the foundation of that greatneſs in the French monarchy, which is to this day formidable to the liberty of England.

"Such were the fruits of a Government carried on upon the principles of public good, and of that œconomy preſerved by the Parliament; and ſuch the miſchief to ſociety, when the luſts of an individual are to be ſupplied from the public ſtock, and the general good of the community ſacrificed to particular intereſt. The aggrandizement of the French monarchy, to which Cromwell ſo eſſentially contributed, was no leſs fatal to the intereſt of the reformed, which he affected to protect, than oppoſite to the welfare and ſecurity of England. To ſum up the villany of his conduct in a few lines——He deprived his country of a full and equal ſyſtem of liberty, at the very inſtant of fruition; ſtopped the courſe of her power, in the midſt of her victories; impeded the progreſs of reformation, by deſtroying her government and limiting the bounds of her empire; and, by a fatal concurrence of circumſtances, was enabled to obſtruct more good, and occaſion more evil, than has been the lot of any other individual.

"It is ſaid that Cromwell was exemplary in the relative duties of a ſon, a huſband, and a father; and the whole of his private conduct has been allowed by all parties to have been decent, though his mirth often degenerated into buffoonery, and the pleaſures of his table bordered on licentiouſneſs. If, as a citizen and magiſtrate, his character has been attacked by a few of the judicious, there are none who doubt the almoſt ſupernatural abilities of a man, who, from a private ſtation, could attain to the ſummit of ſplendour and power. The accidental occurrences of life, ſo frequently favourable to fools and madmen, are never taken into the account of great fortune. Fairfax, though his underſtanding is allowed by all parties to have been weak, had he poſſeſſed a heart as corrupt as Cromwell's, might have taken the advantage his military command gave him, to tyrannize over a people unſettled in their government, ignorant of their true happineſs, and divided both in their political and religious opinions. Fairfax, without abilities to be of eminent ſervice to his country, was too honeſt to do it a real injury. The ſelfiſh Cromwell let no opportunity ſlip to turn to his particular advantage the victories gained on the ſide of liberty, and eſtabliſh a perſonal intereſt on the ruins of the public cauſe. That he was active, eager, and acute; that he was a maſter in all the powers of grimace and the arts of hypocriſy, is obvious in every part of his conduct: but theſe qualities are no proof of extraordinary abilities: they are to be met with daily in common life, and never fail of ſucceſs equal to their opportunities. The ſagacity and judgment of Cromwell, in that point where his peculiar intereſt was immediately concerned, will appear very deficient, if we conſider the ſacrifice he made of thoſe durable bleſſings which muſt have attended his perſon and poſterity, from acting an honeſt part, in the eſtabliſhing the Commonwealth on a juſt and permanent baſis, and the obvious danger of thoſe evils he incurred for the temporary gratification of reigning a few years at the expence of honour, conſcience, and repoſe.

"Cromwell, both by the male and the female line, was deſcended from families of good antiquity; and though it does not appear he was a proficient in any of the learned ſciences, yet his father, notwithſtanding his circumſtances were narrow, was not ſparing in the article of education. An elevated ſenſe of religion, which took place in his mind after a licentious and prodigal courſe, recommended him to the reformers of the age, and was the cauſe of his promotion to a ſeat in Parliament; and the grimace of godlineſs, when the reality was extinguiſhed by the fumes of ambition, with his ſignal military talents, at length lifted him to the throne of empire. Notwithſtanding that perfection in the ſcience of war to which he attained, he was upwards of forty when he commenced ſoldier; a circumſtance not to be forgotten, as it is the only ſplendid part of his character (340)."

(340) Macaulay's Hiſt. of Eng. vol. v. p. 191—208. Octavo edit.

Without ſtopping to enquire, whether Mrs. Macaulay's zeal for liberty, and admiration of the Republican Parliament, may not ſometimes have led her to fix Cromwell's talents on too low a ſcale, we cannot but expreſs our full conviction, that no rational and conſiſtent friend to civil freedom can ever be an applauder of his conduct. The man, who, ſetting out in the cauſe of the people, could at length trample upon their rights, and erect himſelf into a tyrant, muſt juſtly be regarded with indignation and abhorrence. It is not in the power of ſome wiſe, ſplendid, and even laudable actions to wipe away the ſtains that adhere to ſuch a character, and to prevent their being tranſmitted, in their true colours, to poſterity. Tyranny is tyranny ſtill, with whatever prudence it may occaſionally be tempered, with whatever good qualities it may ſometimes be accompanied.

We ſhall add two ſketches of Cromwell drawn by Mr. Granger. "Oliver Cromwell united, in a very "high degree, the characters of the Politician and "the General; and occaſionally aſſumed thoſe of the "Buffoon, and the Preacher. He broke forth from "his obſcurity, at an age when others think themſelves doomed to it for ever; and when many begin to entertain thoughts of retiring from the "world, he began to make the moſt conſpicuous "figure in it. He availed himſelf of the virtues and "and the vices, the talents and the weakneſſes of "mankind; and ſuch obſtacles as would have been "inſurmountable to an inferior genius, helped "greatly to carry him on in his career (341)."

(341) Biogra. Hiſt. of Eng. vol. ii. p. 251. 2d edit.

"This great man, ſays Mr. Granger in another "part of his work, whoſe genius was awakened by "the diſtractions of his country, was looked upon as "one of the people, till he was upwards of forty "years of age. He is an amazing inſtance of what "ambition, heated by enthuſiaſm, reſtrained by "judgment, diſguiſed by hypocriſy, and aided by "natural vigour of mind can do. He was never oppreſſed with the weight, or perplexed with the intricacy of affairs; but his deep penetration, indefatigable activity, and invincible reſolution, ſeemed "to render him a maſter of all events. He perſuaded "without eloquence; and exacted obedience, more "from the terror of his name, than the rigour of his "adminiſtration. He appeared as a powerful inſtrument in the hand of Providence, and dared to "appeal to the deciſions of Heaven for the juſtice of "his cauſe. He knew every man in the three kingdoms, and endeavoured to avail himſelf of their reſpective talents. He has always been regarded by "foreigners, and of late years by the generality of "his countrymen, as the greateſt man this nation "ever produced. It has been diſputed which he "deſerved moſt, a halter or a crown; and there is no "leſs diſparity betwixt the characters drawn of him, "and the reports propagated by his enemies and his "friends. Colonel Lindſey affirmed, that he ſaw "him enter into a formal contract with the devil; "and Dawbeny has drawn a parallel betwixt Moſes "the man of God, and Oliver the Protector. The "French Court went into mourning for him; but "the famous Mademoiſelle de Montpenſier diſdained to pay that reſpect to the memory of an Uſurper (342)."

(342) Ibid. vol. ii. p. 11, 12.

Mr. Granger has mentioned a ſlight circumſtance with regard to Cromwell's perſon, which has eſcaped the notice of moſt of his Biographers. It is, that his noſe was remarkably red and ſhining, on which account it was the ſubject of much ridicule. Cleiveland in his character of a London Diurnal, humorouſly ſays, "This Cromwell ſhould be a bird of "prey by his bloody beak: his noſe is able to try a "young eagle, whether ſhe be lawfully begotten; "but all is not gold that gliſters. Again, Crom"well's noſe wears the dominical letter." The ſame Biographer has given the following anecdote from Dr. Hickes's Diſcourſes on Dr. Burnet and Dr. Tillotſon. A Gentleman came to Oliver, to beg a lock of Charles's hair for an honourable Lady. "Ah! no Sir, ſaid Cromwell burſting into tears, "that muſt not be; for I ſwore to him when he was "living, that not a hair of his head ſhould periſh "(343)." The incongruity of this ſtory might poſſibly not be too hard for the digeſtion of Dr. Hickes.

(343) Ibid. p. 59. 61.

On the ſubject of Oliver's being ſometimes a preacher, Mr Granger informs us, that there is a Sermon ſaid to have been preached by him, on Rom. xiii. 1. the laſt Lord's day in April, 1649, at Sir P. T.'s houſe in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. It was printed in 1680. There is no internal evidence of it's being genuine; and as it abounds with low ribaldry and egregious nonſenſe, it was probably a fabrication to ſerve party purpoſes. Fictions of this kind have not been ſo uncommon as to be a matter of ſurprize.

Cromwell may not only be mentioned as having been, in ſome degree, an encourager of learning, but as having, likewiſe, been in ſome degree a patron of the arts. There are more original paintings of him than has generally been imagined; and they were done by the firſt Artiſts of the time, Cooper, Walker, Vandyke, and Sir Peter Lely. The engraved portraits of him are very numerous. A large Catalogue of them is given by Mr. Granger, and Mr. Noble has exhauſted the ſubject, with regard both to the pictures and prints of Oliver (344). We ſhall ſelect one or two circumſtances, that are particularly curious. Ferdinand the Second, grand Duke of Florence, who, having felt the weight of the Protector's vengeance, not only courted his friendſhip, whilſt living, but reſpected his memory when dead, ordered his Reſident in London, to procure him the beſt original picture of Cromwell that could be obtained. Accordingly, the Reſident applied to a Lady, a relation of the Protector's, who was poſſeſſed of a fine painting of him, by Walker. The Lady was unwilling to part with the picture; but, at the ſame time, not chooſing to diſpleaſe a ſovereign Prince, ſhe aſked five hundred pounds for it, believing that ſuch a ſum would not be given. However, to her great ſurprize, the money was immediately paid; and the piece was ſent to Florence, where it hangs in the old Palace, amongſt the illuſtrious Generals. The preſent Biſhop of Peterborough (Dr. Hinchcliffe) has acquainted Mr. Noble, that he thinks it to be an half-length, and in armour.

(344) Granger, ubi ſupra, vol. ii. p. 216. 251. vol. iii. p. 5—12. 72. Noble's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 123. 300—311.

Before the Reſident had made this purchaſe, being ſenſible of the value his Maſter had for Oliver's character, and conſequently how acceptable a good likeneſs of him would be, he is ſaid to have bribed a perſon in the Palace, that had acceſs to the Protector's corpſe, to permit a model to be taken off, in Plaiſter of Paris, and that only a few minutes after his Highneſs's diſſolution. A caſt, wrought from this mould, and which is either of bronze, with a braſs hue, or ſtained to give it that appearance, is now in the Florentine Gallery. Breval obſerves of it, that there is ſomething more remarkably ſtrong and expreſſive in it, than in any picture or buſt of the Uſurper which he had ever ſeen. Lord Corke, in his deſcription of it, remarks, that it bears the ſtrongeſt characteriſtics of boldneſs, ſteadineſs, ſenſe, penetration and pride; and, therefore, he diſbelieves its having been done after Cromwell's deceaſe. The muſcles, his Lordſhip adds, are ſtrong and lively, and the look is fierce and commanding; whereas death ſinks the features, renders all the muſcles languid, and flattens every nerve. Biſhop Hinchcliffe concurs in opinion with Lord Corke. On the whole, Mr. Noble concludes it to be moſt probable, that the grand Duke aſked, and obtained the buſt from Oliver himſelf (345).

(345) Noble, ubi ſupra.

Simon, the Medalliſt, was patronized by Cromwell. His medals, coins, and ſeals, were chiefly engraved by that incomparable artiſt; who, in 1656, was appointed to the office of Principal Engraver and Medal-maker. Notwithſtanding his decided ſuperiority to every rival, Simon was neglected after the Reſtoration (346).

(346) Ibid. Pinkerton's Eſſay on Medals, vol. ii. p. 143.

Strange ſtories have been told concerning the diſpoſal of Oliver's body; ſome of which are mentioned in note [PP]. It is ſufficient here to ſay, that the futility of all of them has been well expoſed by Mr. Noble, who has clearly ſhewn that he was buried in Weſtminſter-

Weſtminſter-Abbey. It need not be added, that, after the Reſtoration, his corpſe was taken up, hanged at Tyburn, and the head fixed upon a pole, at the top of Weſtminſter Hall (347).

(347) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 288—291.

It was not poſſible, that the wife of ſo celebrated a man, in ſuch a violent colliſion of parties, ſhould eſcape the ſhafts of calumny. Several aſperſions were thrown upon her; but they appear to have been totally groundleſs. Mr. Granger has characterized her as a woman of an enlarged underſtanding, and an elevated ſpirit. "She was," he adds, "an excellent "houſe wife, and as capable of deſcending to the "kitchen with propriety, as ſhe was of acting in her "exalted ſtation with dignity. It has been aſſerted, that "ſhe as deeply intereſted herſelf in ſteering the helm, "as ſhe had often done in turning the ſpit; and that "ſhe was as conſtant a ſpur to her huſband in the "career of his ambition, as ſhe had been to her ſer-"vants in their culinary employments. Certain it "is, that ſhe acted a much more prudent part as Pro-"tectreſs, than Henrietta did as Queen; and that "ſhe educated her children with as much ability as "ſhe governed her family with addreſs. Such a "woman would by a natural tranſition have filled a "throne (348)."

(348) Granger, ubi ſupra, vol. iii. p. 13.

Mr. Granger's idea, that Mrs. Cromwell interfered greatly in the affairs of Government, does not appear to be well founded. She was, indeed, a woman of ability and ſpirit, notwithſtanding which, ſhe generally acted in conformity to the Protector's deſire; and when ſhe did exert herſelf, it was rather to bridle, than to ſtimulate his ambition. Ludlow acknowledges, that when Oliver removed from the cock-pit to Whitehall, his wife ſeemed at firſt unwilling to go thither, though afterwards ſhe became better ſatisfied with her grandeur. When her huſband was at the very ſummit of his power, ſhe earneſtly wiſhed for, and endeavoured to effect a reconciliation with the Royal Family. For this purpoſe, ſhe liſtened eagerly to a propoſal of Lady Dyſert (afterwards Ducheſs of Lauderdale) for reſtoring the exiled Monarch, and promiſed to break it to his Highneſs. Accordingly, ſhe took an opportunity of doing it one morning before he roſe; when, having repreſented the many dangers he was expoſed to from his ſituation, and the certain ruin that would befall his family at his deceaſe, ſhe deſired him to accept the Carte Blanche the King was willing to grant. This, ſhe urged, would not only obtain a pardon for all paſt offences, but ſecure to himſelf and his poſterity honours little leſs than regal. The ſole anſwer ſhe received to her repreſentation was, "You are a fool: Charles Stuart can "never forgive me his father's death, nor the injuſ-"tice he has ſuffered from me; and if he can, he is "unworthy of the Crown." Only one letter of Mrs. Cromwell's has been preſerved. It was written in 1650, and affords ſufficient evidence of her affection for, and ſubmiſſion to her huſband (349).

(349) Noble's Memoirs, vol. ii. p. 124—131, 311, 312.

Great pains have been taken of late years to obtain every poſſible information concerning the family of Oliver Cromwell, and to trace his deſcendants down to the preſent time. The ſubject was, in part, begun by Mr. Duncombe, or rather by Mr. Luſon, in the Appendix to the ſecond Volume of Hughes's Letters; was carried on by Dr. Gibbons, at the end of his funeral Sermon for Mr. William Cromwell; and has ſtill more minutely been purſued in one of the numbers of the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica. But for the moſt complete and extenſive intelligence, recourſe muſt be had to Mr. Noble's Memoirs of the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell, to which we have already ſo frequently referred. In this work will be found not only whatever could well be collected concerning the poſterity of the Protector, but an account of all the families to which the Houſe of Cromwell was allied, as well as of the principal perſons who were diſtinguiſhed and employed by Oliver during his government. Of Mr. Noble's publication we ſhall make no farther uſe, at preſent, than to avail ourſelves of its aſſiſtance in writing the two following articles of Richard and Henry Cromwell. It may here be obſerved, that the extraordinary character of Mrs. Bridget Bendyſh, the granddaughter of the Protector, and daughter of Ireton, which makes ſo prominent a figure in Mr. Duncombe's collection, has not been forgotten by us, but will be properly noticed in another part of our work.] K.

 [CROMWELL (RICHARD), ſon of Oliver, and for a ſhort time, ſucceſſor to his father, as Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and of the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, was born at Huntingdon, on the fourth of October, 1626, and baptized at St. John's Church in that town, on the nineteenth of the ſame month. It is probable that his uncle, Richard Cromwell, Eſq; was one of his ſponſors, and gave him his name, and certain that Mr. Henry Downtell, of St. John's College, in Cambridge, was another. His grammatical education, together with that of two of his brothers, was completed at Felſted, in Eſſex, whither he was ſent, that he might be under the inſpection of his maternal grandfather, Sir James Bourchier, who reſided at that place. On the 27th of May, 1647, when he was far advanced in the twenty-firſt year of his age, he was admitted to the Society of Lincoln's Inn, where he did not diſtinguiſh himſelf by the cloſeneſs of his application, or his ardent proſecution of legal knowledge. His time was chiefly ſpent in the purſuits of pleaſure; and it is remarkable, that, while the nation was torn to pieces by faction and civil war, he took no part in the conteſt; but led a life of privacy and inactivity. What is ſtill more obſervable, whilſt Oliver was fighting the battles of the Parliament, Richard Cromwell was the companion of the moſt loyal Cavaliers, and frequently drank ſucceſs to the arms of the Sovereign whom his father was labouring to dethrone. When that unfortunate Monarch was condemned to death, Richard, it is ſaid, was ſo ſtruck with the horror of his approaching fate, that he threw himſelf upon his knees, and pleaded the cauſe of fallen majeſty. But Oliver was not a man who could be diverted, by the entreaties and tears of his ſon, from executing the purpoſe he had formed (a).

(a) Noble's Memoirs of the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell, vol. i. p. 158, 159.

Soon after the King's death, Richard Cromwell, in conſequence of the eminence to which his family was now riſing, obtained a very eligible marriage with Dorothy, the eldeſt daughter of Richard Maijor, of Hurſley, in the county of Hants. The Negociation for this alliance may be ſeen in ſome letters of Oliver's which have been given to the public, by Dr. Harris and Mr. Noble (b). Richard Cromwell had a very conſiderable fortune with his Lady; and after his marriage, retired to Hurſley, where he reſided for ſome years, and became entirely the country Gentleman; indulging himſelf in hunting, hawking, and the other rural ſports of the age. Neither did he here forget his former principles of loyalty, but retained the ſame attachment to Charles the Second which he had borne to Charles the Firſt, and uſed his beſt endeavours to ſerve ſuch of the adherents to the royal family family as fell into inconveniences on that account. During his retirement, he did not otherwiſe concern himſelf with public affairs, but ſpent his time in the company of his wife, to whom he was tenderly devoted, and in a hoſpitable mode of living, which exceeded the rules of frugality and prudence. Upon his father's advancement to the Protectorate, he was choſen to repreſent the counties of Monmouth and Southampton. This was in 1654; and on the eleventh of November, 1655, he was made firſt Lord of Trade and Navigation. In Auguſt, 1656, he was returned one of the county Members for Hants, as well as Repreſentative for the Univerſity of Cambridge. The next year, he had a narrow eſcape from being cruſhed to death, by the giving way of the ſtairs of the Banqueting-Houſe, when the Members of Parliament were going to pay their reſpects to Oliver. Some of his bones were broken by this accident; but having the advantage of youth and a good conſtitution in his favour, his health and ſtrength were ſpeedily reſtored (c).

The Protector having reſigned the Chancellorſhip of the Univerſity of Oxford, on the third of July, 1657, that learned body manifeſted their regard for the family of his Highneſs, by chooſing Richard for his ſucceſſor. The choice was made on the eighteenth of the ſame month, and on the twenty-ninth following, he was inſtalled in his new office at Whitehall. On this occaſion, the ceremony was performed with great ſplendour; and next to the Chancellor, the moſt conſpicuous perſon at the Inſtallation was Dr. Wilkins, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter. At the ſame time, to do him ſtill greater honour, Richard was created a Maſter of Arts, in a Convocation of Doctors and Maſters of the Univerſity, aſſembled at the Palace for that purpoſe. One of his firſt acts, as Chancellor of Oxford, was to remove Dr. Owen from the Vice-chancellorſhip, and to appoint Dr. John Conant in his room. The next honours conferred upon Richard Cromwell, were his being ſworn a Privy-Counſellor, and made a Colonel in the army. When Oliver formed the deſign of creating a Houſe of Peers, he placed Richard at the head of this newly conſtituted body. The Protector had been obliged to be cautious, in thus bringing his ſon forward to public notice. From the fear of alarming the Republicans, he had pretended, for a while, that he had no thoughts of raiſing his ſons above the rank of private Gentlemen. But when he was more ſolemnly inaugurated and confirmed in his Protectorſhip, he diſplayed other views; though he ſtill concealed his wiſhes of transferring the ſovereign power, in hereditary ſucceſſion, to his family (d).

It has generally been repreſented that Richard Cromwell was diſſatisfied with his father's grandeur, and thought that it was not built upon a good foundation. It does not, however, appear that he expreſſed any degree of heſitation in accepting the Government of theſe kingdoms: nor, on the other hand, is there reaſon to believe that he looked forward to it with pleaſure. It is certain that he felt a real concern on account of Oliver's laſt illneſs; and a letter which he wrote to an intimate friend on that occaſion, while it manifeſts his diſpoſition in this reſpect, ſhews that he was poſſeſſed of a ſound underſtanding [A]. On the fourth of September, 1658, the day after his father's deceaſe, he was proclaimed with great ſolemnity, and the form of the proclamation was as follows: "Whereas it hath "pleaſed the moſt wiſe God, in his Providence, to take out of this world, the moſt ſerene "and the moſt renowned Oliver, late Lord Protector of this Commonwealth; and his "ſaid Highneſs having, in his life-time, according to the humble petition and advice, de-"clared and appointed the moſt noble and illuſtrious the Lord Richard, eldeſt ſon of his "ſaid Highneſs, to ſucceed him in the Government of theſe nations: We, therefore, of "the Privy Council, together with the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and the Citizens of Lon-"don; the Officers of the Army, and numbers of other principal Gentlemen, do now "hereby, with one full voice and conſent of tongue and heart, publiſh and declare the ſaid "Noble and Illuſtrious Lord Richard to be rightfully Protector of this Commonwealth of "England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging;

[A] Shews that he was poſſeſſed of a ſound underſtanding.] The truth of what is aſſerted above will beſt appear from the letter itſelf, which was written from Whitehall, on the 28th of Auguſt, 1658, to Captain John Dunche, at Peuſey, near Abingdon, in Berkſhire.

"SIR,

"I intended to have written to you by the firſt return, but ſince his Highneſs has been ſo ill, that I have not had either opportunity or deſire to ſet pen to paper; we have not been without very great fears; for his Highneſs's illneſs hath been ſuch as hath put the Phyſicians to a nonplus. Our hopes are ſomewhat increaſed by this fit of an ague; and ſhall it pleaſe God to go on with his gentle hand, and bring him temperately out of this fit, and not renew it, at the time his former fit began, or viſit us with a quartan, we ſhall have ſome reviving comfort, and cauſe to magnify his goodneſs; it being a new life to his Highneſs and the affairs as they now ſtand, of this nation, with the Proteſtant intereſt of Chriſtendom. I believe the rumours of this dangerous illneſs hath flown into all parts of this nation, and hath cauſed ſeveral perſons of ill affections to prick up their ears, which will cauſe friends to be vigilant, for they will hope they have a game to play: it is a time that will diſcover all colours, and much of the diſpoſition of the nation may now be gathered. I heard that thoſe who have been enemies, others that have been no friends, ſome of both, are ſtartled; fearing their poſſeſſions, and worſe conditions, not conſidering their affection, in this hazard his Highneſs is in. It muſt be the goodneſs of God that ſhall ſave him, and his knowledge of the ſtate of England and Chriſtendom; the ſpirit of prayer which is poured out for him, and the faith which is acted on behalf of him, gives us the beſt comfort and hopes: mine and my wife's reſpects to your father and mother.

"I reſt yours,

"R. CROMWELL (1)."

" to whom we do acknowledge all fidelity and conſtant obedience, according to law, and " the ſaid humble petition and advice, with all hearty and humble affections; beſeeching " the Lord, by whom Princes rule, to bleſs him with long life, and theſe nations with " peace and happineſs under his government (e)."

(e) Parl. Hiſt. of Eng. vol. xxi. p. 228, 229.

Richard's acceſſion to power was followed by every apparent teſtimony of attachment and affection. Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, in the name of the Officers of the Army of England; Monk, for thoſe of Scotland; Sir Charles Coote, for Ireland; and Lockhart, from Dunkirk, all preſented their congratulations to him, and their vows of fidelity. The ſame was done by Admiral Montagu, in behalf of the Navy. The zeal of the Citizens of London for his ſervice, appeared more unanimous than it had been for that of his father; and moſt of the counties, cities, and towns in the three nations, teſtified, by addreſſes under their hands, their obedience to their new Sovereign. Nay, the ſpirit of addreſſing extended to the Plantations. The young Protector, in many of theſe ſolemn congratulations, was highly magnified for his wiſdom, his nobleneſs of mind, and the lovely compoſition of his body. At the ſame time, the memory of Oliver was loaded with flattery. He was compared to Moſes, Zerubbabel, Joſhua, Gideon, and Elijah; to David, Solomon and Hezekiah; to Conſtantine the Great; and, in ſhort, to every other perſon who had been celebrated, either in the ſacred Scriptures or profane Hiſtory, for their piety or their goodneſs, their wiſdom or their valour. Of theſe addreſſes, one ſpecimen ſhall be inſerted below [B], which ſeems to have been a model for many of the others; and we have given it

[B] One ſpecimen ſhall be inſerted below.]

" To his Highneſs the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging,

" The Humble Addreſs of the Officers of your Highneſs's Armies in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

" May it pleaſe your Highneſs,

" WHEN we call to mind how God, the great and wiſe diſpoſer of all things, hath, by a long continued ſeries of Providence, carried on his work in theſe nations by the hands of ſeveral inſtruments, making it manifeſtly to proſper in the hands of all thoſe that did heartily own his cauſe and people; but moſt remarkably and eminently, in the hands of that man whom he had choſen, your deceaſed father, whoſe memory ſhall be bleſt, and will be had in perpetual remembrance amongſt good men, as having been the great aſſertor of the liberties of God's people, an inſtrument to reſtore theſe nations to peace, a lover of their civil rights, and ſo indefatigable in his endeavours after reformation; the mentioning of whom may well ſtrike our hearts with unconceivable ſorrow and abaſement, to think that we, by our ſins, have provoked the God of all our Mercies to give us ſuch a ſtroke, by taking from us the delight of our eyes, and, under God, the Captain of his people, upon whom the eyes of foreign Princes were fixed with reverence and expectation.

" Oh! how glorioufly did the Lord appear for and with him in the midſt of his people, making the mountains to become a plain before him, and carrying him upon the wings of faith and prayer, above all difficulties and oppoſitions? How did the graces of God's ſpirit evidently ſhine forth in him? In his armies he reckoned the choiceſt ſaints his chiefeſt worthies; in his family, thoſe that were near and dear to God, were near and dear to him. His eyes were upon the faithful in the land, to relieve many, to advance ſome, to protect and countenance all. In the things of God he had a tender and large heart, to love all the ſaints though of different judgments. He had great acquaintance with the Lord, mighty in faith and prayer, which made him ſo conſtant and glorious a victor.

" Your Highneſs, your armies, and people, reap the benefit of his prayers and ſucceſſes; but, alas! this our Moſes (your dear and bleſſed father) the ſervant of the Lord is dead, and ſhall we not weep? Though we weep not for him, yet we cannot but weep for ourſelves. We cannot but look after him crying, Our Father, our Father, the Chariots of Iſrael and the horſemen thereof.

" When we conſider theſe things, we cannot but reverence the ſame Providence, in bringing your Highneſs to ſucceed him in the Government, with ſo much ſerenity and general conſent and approbation of the people, when the enemy ſo ſtrenuouſly endeavours to promote diſtractions and diviſions; and we cannot but hope, though it hath pleaſed the Lord ſharply to rebuke us, yet he will not caſt us off, nor withdraw his fatherly affections from us; but, in our returnings, he will give us reſt, and will enable your Highneſs to carry on that good old cauſe and intereſt of God and his people upon your heart continually, and then he will carry you as upon eagle's wings, above all the malice and wicked machinations of ungodly men, to do valiantly in Iſrael, in the further enlarging of the kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, in maintaining the Chriſtian liberty of all ſober godly men, though of different opinions in ſome things; the defending of the civil rights of the whole people of theſe nations; and the reformation of all abuſes.

" And more particularly, that we may open our hearts before you, we hope and pray that God will enable your Highneſs to endeavour, that the army which ſhall be thought fit to be kept up in the three nations, may be continued, and kept under the command of ſuch officers as are of honeſt and godly principles, free to adventure all, that is dear to them, by all lawful ways and means to maintain an equal and juſt liberty to all perſons that profeſs godlineſs, that are not of turbulent ſpirits as to the peace of theſe nations, nor diſturbers of others, though different in ſome things from themſelves, according to the true intent of the humble petition and advice.

" That the vacancies in your Highneſs's Council, and other places of public truſt, be, from time to time, ſupplied and filled up with men of known godlineſs and ſober principles, that they, with your Highneſs and your armies, may make it their work to carry on the concernments of the godly in theſe nations, and the civil rights of the people thereof, upon their hearts, with full purpoſe to maintain the ſame; and that a work of reformation, tending to good life and manners, may be vigorouſly carried on by the hands of good Magiſtrates, and thoſe things that are vexati us and oppreſſive to the people may be ſuppreſſed.

" That the proviſion made for the ejecting ſcandalous, ignorant, and inſufficient Miniſters, and that for the approbation of Miniſters tending to the bringing in of godly and able Preachers into the ſeveral places of theſe nations (whereby poor and ignorant ſouls may be brought to the knowledge of the truth) may be owned and maintained in their power, according to the Acts of Parliament; and that any who ſhall diſcourage or diſcountenance good Miniſters in theſe nations, by encouraging looſe and profane perſons to oppoſe and ſlight them for not admitting ſuch as are looſe and profane to the Sacrament, may be diſcountenanced and puniſhed.

" In your proſecution whereof, we hope that God will aſſiſt us to make it known to your Highneſs, and it the preference, as it affords a direct contraſt to what was preſented, a few months after, by the ſame body of men. It is ſaid that this Addreſs was drawn up at Court, and that copies of it were ſent to the ſeveral regiments of the three nations, to be ſubſcribed: nor is it improbable that this might be the caſe, when it is conſidered how nearly related Fleetwood, who had then the Chief Command of the Engliſh Army, was to the Protector. Henry Cromwell, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is, likewiſe, underſtood to have had no ſmall hand in the ſcheme of procuring the preſentation of a general Addreſs from the three Armies; and his deſign in it was, to diſplay the great unanimity of the ſoldiery in ſupport of his brother's ſucceſſion (f).

(f) Ibid. p. 232. 236, 237.

The reſpect paid to Richard was not confined to his own ſubjects. Foreign Princes and States addreſſed their condolences to him, and ſought a renewal of their alliances. M. de Bourdeaux, the Ambaſſador from France, diſtinguiſhed himſelf above all others on this occaſion. At an audience which he had of the Protector, and to which he was introduced by Sir Oliver Fleming, Maſter of the Ceremonies, he preſented to his Highneſs two letters; one from the King of France, the other from his Eminency Cardinal Mazarine, as Chief Miniſter of State; and delivered himſelf, in a ſpeech, to the following effect: "That his Maſter, the King of France, having heard of the death of his late Highneſs, of glorious memory, did very much take to heart the loſs of ſo great a Captain, and ſo good an Ally of his Crown: that his Majeſty rejoiced at being informed that, in order to the repairing of ſo great a loſs, it had pleaſed God to eſtabliſh his Highneſs, as his father's undoubted ſucceſſor: that it was the deſire of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, by all means, to maintain that alliance and amity, which had hitherto been of ſo great an advantage to both nations: and that his Majeſty, to manifeſt the ſincerity of his friendſhip, would be ready upon any occaſion, either with his Counſels or Forces, to aſſiſt the Lord Protector againſt any of his enemies or oppoſers whatſoever." To this ſpeech the Ambaſſador added, in his own behalf, "That as he himſelf had a great affection for the Engliſh nation, having now many years reſided here, and a particular regard for the perſon of his late Highneſs the Lord Protector, to whom he always bore a profound reverence on account of his princely virtues; ſo he ſhould at all times be ready to give his moſt noble ſon and ſucceſſor a teſtimony how joyful he was to ſee his Highneſs thus happily eſtabliſhed in the Government, and how deſirous he was to render him every poſſible proof of his eſteem and devotion (g)."

(g) Ibid. p. 237, 238.

For ſome time, the ſituation of Richard had every thing that was promiſing and proſperous in its external appearance. The voice of joy and of praiſe was heard from all parts; and perhaps this agreeable proſpect might have continued much longer, had not the neceſſities of the State required the calling of a Parliament. By an alliance which Oliver, not long before his death, had made with the Crown of Sweden, and of which he was fonder than of all the reſt of his engagements, he had ſtood obliged to ſend, in the Spring, a ſtrong fleet into the Sound, to aſſiſt that King againſt Denmark; or, at leaſt, to act ſo powerfully the part of a Mediator, as to induce the Daniſh Monarch to accept ſuch conditions of peace as the other ſhould be willing to propoſe. This could ſcarcely be done without parliamentary aſſiſtance; and therefore, the new Protector, by the advice of his Council, iſſued out writs about the middle of December, ſummoning a Parliament to meet on the twenty-ſeventh of January. Till that day, being nearly five months from his Acceſſion to the Protectorſhip, he ſeemed to remain as great a Prince as ever his father had been before him. During the two laſt Parliaments of Oliver, no writs had been iſſued out to the meaner boroughs, but only to capital towns; and he had increaſed the number of Knights of Shires, in proportion to the aſſeſſments paid by each county to the public ſervice. In conſequence of this popular and equitable ſcheme, the Houſe was filled with ſo great a number of independent Gentlemen, of the beſt families and eſtates in the kingdom, that he had no way of managing them, but by excluding, either by fraud or force, thoſe who were the true friends of the Conſtitution. His ſon Richard, therefore, to avoid ſplitting upon the ſame rock, and not daring to rule without a Parliament, all the world, that we aim not at any private intereſt or end of our own; but that we ſhall be heartily and faithfully with you, as we have been with your father, to adventure our lives and all that is dear unto us to ſtand by you. Theſe being the principles upon which we engaged with your bleſſed father, and were bleſſed of God in, and we truſt God will direct your heart to be fixed and bottomed upon the ſame principles, which we are perſuaded God will own you in, and bleſs us in ſtanding by you againſt all that ſhall oppoſe you therein, or make it their deſign to change or alter the preſent Government eſtabliſhed in a ſingle perſon and two Houſes of Parliament, according to the humble petition and advice, or ſhall endeavour the ſubverſion thereof, or the diſturbance of the peace of theſe nations.

"And we are confident you will have the concurrent helps of the prayers and endeavours of the people of God, whereby your heart and hand will be ſtrengthened to ride on proſperouſly, to the joy and rejoicing of all good men, and to the terror and diſappointment of all your adverſaries, when they ſhall perceive you inherit, not only your father's glory and authority, but alſo the hearts of his old faithful followers; and (which crowns all) the bleſſing of the God of your father; which that it may be continued unto you, and proſper you, in all that you put your hand unto, is and ſhall be the continual prayer of

Your Highneſs's moſt humble and loyal Servants.

reſolved

reſolved to call his upon the old model. Accordingly, only two Knights of the Shire were elected for each county; and all the petty boroughs were reſtored to their ancient uſages and returns. This was done by the Protector under the pretence of ingratiating himſelf with the people; but the real deſign was to make way for his own creatures and dependents. As to the Members of the Upper Houſe, they were all ſufficiently attached to him by his father's or his own choice and election (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 245, 246.

On the twenty-ſeventh of January, 1658-9, the Parliament met, according to appointment, and Richard came to Weſtminſter with the ſame ſtate and ſolemnity that Oliver had done. The Commons aſſembled in their uſual place; and the new Lords, who had alſo been ſummoned, by writ, to attend according to the humble Petition and advice, took their ſeats in the Upper Houſe. In the laſt Parliament, the Commons had refuſed to acknowledge the authority of their Lordſhips; and this was one principal cauſe of their own diſſolution. Something of the ſame ſpirit operated on the preſent occaſion. When his Highneſs ſent the Uſher of the Black Rod to ſummon the Commons to attend him in the other Houſe, it was only a ſmall number that thought proper to obey the Call. Thoſe, however, who did appear before him, heard a Speech from him much ſuperior to their expectations [C], and which far exceeded that which followed from the Lord Commiſſioner Fiennes, the Keeper of the Great Seal (i).

(i) Ibid. p. 262—265.

[C] Heard a Speech from him much ſuperior to their expectations.] This Speech, which reflects credit on the good ſenſe of Richard, or his adviſers, was as follows:

" My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I BELIEVE there are ſcarce any of you here, who expected, ſome months ſince, to have ſeen this great Aſſembly, at this time, in this place, in peace; conſidering the great and unexpected change which it hath pleaſed the all-diſpoſing hand of God to make in the midſt of us. I can aſſure you, that if things had been according to our own fears, and the hopes of our enemies, it had not been thus with us: and therefore it will become both you and me, in the firſt place, (as to reverence and adore the great God, Poſſeſſor of Heaven and Earth, in whoſe hands our breath is, and whoſe are all our ways, becauſe of his judgments) ſo to acknowledge him in his goodneſs to theſe lands, in that he hath not added ſorrow to ſorrow, and made the period of his late Highneſs's life, and that of the nation's peace, to have been in one day.

" Peace was one of the bleſſings of my father's Government: a mercy after ſo long a civil war, and in the midſt of ſo great diviſion which that war bred, is not uſually afforded, by God, unto a people in ſo great a meaſure.

" The cauſe of God, and theſe nations, which he was engaged in, met in all the parts of it, as you well know, with many enemies and great oppoſition. The Archers, privily and openly, ſorely grieved him, and ſhot at him; yet his bow abode in ſtrength, and the arms of his hands were made ſtrong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob.

" As to himſelf; he died full of days, ſpent in great and ſore travail: yet his eyes were not waxed dim, neither was his natural ſtrength abated: as it was ſaid of Moſes, he was ſerviceable even to the laſt.

" As to theſe nations; he left them in great honour abroad, and in full peace at home; all England, Scotland, and Ireland dwelling ſafely, every man under his vine, and under his fig-tree, from Dan even to Beerſheba.

" He is gone to reſt, and we are entered into his labours; and if the Lord hath ſtill a bleſſing for theſe lands, (as I truſt he hath) as our peace hath been lengthened out to this day, ſo ſhall we go on to reap the fruit, and gather the harveſt of what his late Highneſs hath ſown, and laid the foundation of.

" For my own part, being by the Providence of God and the diſpoſition of the law, my father's ſucceſſor, and bearing that place in the Government that I do, I thought it for the public good to call a Parliament of the three nations, now united, and conjoined together into one Commonwealth, under one Government.

" It is agreeable not only to my truſt, but to my principles, to govern theſe nations by the advice of my two Houſes of Parliament. I find it aſſerted in the humble petition and advice, (which is the corner-ſtone of this building, and that which I ſhall adhere to) That Parliaments are the great Council of the Chief Magiſtrate, in whoſe advice both he and theſe nations may be moſt ſafe and happy. I can aſſure you I have that eſteem of them; and as I have made it the firſt act of my Government to call you together, ſo I ſhall further let you ſee the value I have of you, by the anſwers that I ſhall return to the advice that ſhall be given me by you, for the good of theſe nations.

" You are come up from your ſeveral countries, as the heads of your tribes, and with hearts (I perſuade myſelf) to conſult together for their good. I can ſay I meet you with the ſame deſires, having nothing in my deſign, but the maintenance of the peace, laws, liberties, both civil and chriſtian of theſe nations; which I ſhall always make the meaſure and rule of my Government, and be ready to ſpend my life for.

" We have ſummoned you up at this time to let you know the ſtate of our affairs, and to have your advice in them: and I believe a Parliament was never ſummoned upon a more important occaſion.

" It is true, as I have told you, we are, through the goodneſs of God, at this time in peace; but it is not thus with us becauſe we have no enemies: No, there are enough both within us and without us, who would ſoon put an end to our peace, were it in their power, or ſhould it at any time come into their power.

" It will be becoming your wiſdom to conſider of the ſecuring of our peace againſt thoſe, who, we all know, are, and ever will be, our implacable enemies: what the means of doing this are, I ſhall refer unto you.

" This I can aſſure you, that the armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland, are true and faithful to the peace and good intereſt of theſe nations; and it will be found ſo, and that they are a conſiſtent body, and uſeful for any good ends; and if they were not the beſt army in the world, you would have heard of many inconveniences, by reaſon of the great arrear of pay which is now due unto them, whereby ſome of them are reduced to great neceſſities: but you ſhall have a particular account of their arrears, and I doubt not but conſideration will be had thereupon, in ſome ſpeedy and effectual way. And this being matter of money, I recommend it particularly to the Houſe of Commons.

" You have, you know, a war with Spain, carried on by the advice of Parliament. He is an old enemy, and a potent one, and therefore it will be neceſſary, both for the honour and ſafety of theſe nations, that that war be vigorouſly proſecuted.

" Furthermore, the conſtitution of affairs in all our neighbour countries, and round about us, (as well friends as enemies) is very conſiderable; and calls upon us to be upon our guard both at land and ſea, and to be in a poſture able to maintain and conſerve our own ſtate and intereſt.

" Great

The firſt grand object that engaged the attention of Parliament, was a Bill, entitled, "An Act of Recognition of his Highneſs's Right and Title to be Protector and Chief "Magiſtrate of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the Domi-"nions and Territories thereunto belonging." This Bill was brought in, on the firſt of February, by Mr. Secretary Thurloe; and it was comprized in ſuch terms as had no leſs a meaning in them than the admittance of Richard, and the perſons then ſitting in the other Houſe, unto the full power, privileges and prerogative of the ancient Kings, and the ancient Peers of the Realm. It was the view of the Court party to carry the matter undiſcovered; and they were the more encouraged in their hopes of ſucceſs, as the Bill was read the firſt time without much difficulty. Accordingly, ſome of the long robe, who were devoted to the Protector, preſſed for the reading of it again on the ſame day; their deſign in which was, that it ſhould have been read a third time the next day, and thus immediately have paſſed into an Act. But though great pains had been taken to procure a Parliament which ſhould ſupport the meaſures of Richard and his Adminiſtration, it was impoſſible to prevent the principal leaders of the Republican party, and many of the zealous friends of Liberty, from being elected. Theſe, therefore, contended, with equal juſtice and energy, that, according to the rule in ſuch caſes, the Bill ought to be referred to a grand Committee of the whole Houſe. When this could not be obtained, they urged that the ſecond reading of it ought, at leaſt, to be put off for ſome days, and that liberty ſhould be given to the Members to take copies, for the purpoſe of conſidering the buſineſs, and being better prepared for the debate. Thus far they ſucceeded, and the ſeventh of February was appointed for the ſecond reading. When the Houſe, at the time fixed upon, proceeded to the conſideration of this grand point of Government, five whole days were ſpent in debating it, without coming to any concluſion; and on Monday the fourteenth, the Bill was not yet ſo far proceeded in, as to be referred to a Committee. However, on that day, the two following Reſolutions were paſſed, as previous to the commitment of the Bill. The firſt was, "That it be part of this Bill to recog-"nize and declare his Highneſs Richard Lord Protector, to be Lord Protector and Chief "Magiſtrate of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Domi-"nions and Territories thereunto belonging." It was reſolved, ſecondly, "That, be-"fore this Bill be committed, this Houſe do declare ſuch additional clauſes to be part of "this Bill, as may bound the power of the Chief Magiſtrate, and fully ſecure the rights "and privileges of the Parliament, and the liberties and rights of the people; and that "neither this nor any other previous vote that is, or ſhall be, paſſed, in order to this "Bill, is, or ſhall be, of force, or binding, unto the people, until the whole Bill be "paſſed." So conſonant was the laſt Reſolution to the genuine ſentiments of the Members, when under no improper bias, that it paſſed the Houſe without any other negative than that of the Secretary. Nevertheleſs, when the courtiers underſtood, from the manner of Mr. Thurloe's voting, what the diſpoſition was which prevailed at Whitehall, they manifeſted very little ſolicitude for effectually ſecuring the freedom of the Conſtitution. In the courſe of the proceedings on the Recognition Bill, the Commons, after a debate that was carried on with great warmth for ſome days, came to two farther reſolutions. Theſe were, firſt, that it ſhall be part of this Bill to declare the Parliament to conſiſt of two Houſes; and ſecondly, that the bounds and power of the other Houſe ſhould be the firſt buſineſs taken into conſideration. Accordingly, on the twenty-ſecond of February, the ſubject was brought forward; and after a variety of warm debates, which ſometimes laſted for a whole day together, it was at length reſolved, on the twenty-eighth of March, that the Houſe of Commons would tranſact buſineſs with the perſons ſitting in the other Houſe, as an Houſe of Parliament, during the preſent Parliament; and that it was not hereby intended to exclude ſuch Peers, as have been faithful to the Parliament, from their "Great and powerful fleets are preparing to be ſet forth into theſe ſeas, and conſiderable armies of ſeveral nations and kings are now diſputing for the maſtery of the Sound, with the adjacent iſlands and countries; among which is the Emperor of Germany, with other Popiſh States. I need not tell you of what conſequence theſe things are to this State.

"We have already interpoſed in theſe affairs, in ſuch manner as we found it neceſſary for the intereſt of England; and matters are yet in ſuch a condition in thoſe parts, that the State may, with the aſſiſtance of God, provide that their differences may not prejudice us.

"The other things that are to be ſaid I ſhall refer to my Lord-Keeper Fiennes; and cloſe up what I have to ſay, with only adding two or three particulars to what I have already ſaid.

"And, firſt, I recommend to your care the people of God in theſe nations, with their concernments: the more they are divided among themſelves, the greater prudence ſhould be uſed to cement them.

"Secondly, The good and neceſſary work of reformation, both in manners and in the adminiſtration of juſtice, that profaneneſs may be diſcountenanced and ſuppreſſed, and that righteouſneſs and juſtice may be executed in the land.

"Thirdly, I recommend unto you the Proteſtant cauſe abroad, which ſeems at this time to be in ſome danger, having great and powerful enemies, and very few friends; and I hope and believe that the old Engliſh zeal to that cauſe is ſtill amongſt us.

"Laſtly, My Lords, and you Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, That you will, in all your debates, maintain and conſerve Love and Unity among yourſelves, that therein you may be the Pattern of the nation, who have ſent you up in peace, and with their prayers, that the ſpirit of wiſdom and peace may be among you: and this ſhall alſo be my prayer for you; and to this let us all add our utmoſt endeavours for the making this an happy Parliament (3)."

privilege of being duly ſummoned to be Members of that Houſe. It was on this occaſion that the long, ſevere, and able ſpeech was delivered againſt the newly conſtituted Lords, which we have formerly mentioned as having been ſpoken by Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, afterwards firſt Earl of Shafteſbury (k). Another Queſtion which was agitated about the ſame time, was concerning the Members from Scotland and Ireland. Richard had ſummoned thirty Repreſentatives from each of theſe two kingdoms, whoſe right to ſit in the Houſe was ſtrongly objected to by the patriotic party. It was carried, however, without any extraordinary difficulty, though not without conſiderable debates, that the Members returned to ſerve for Scotland and Ireland ſhould continue to ſit and vote during the preſent parliament (l).

Whilſt theſe and other matters were in agitation, the ſituation of the Protector became every day more and more critical and dangerous. The oppoſition to him in the Lower Houſe was powerful and formidable; the Upper Houſe was altogether inſignificant and contemptible; and a ſpirit was riſing againſt him in the Army. One ſtrong proof of this ſpirit appeared in an Addreſs which was preſented to him, in the month of April, entitled, "The humble Repreſentation and Petition" of the General Council of the Officers of the Armies of England, Scotland, and Ireland; in which, amongſt a variety of complaints, they ſtrongly inſiſted that their arrears ſhould be ſatisfied. If the Parliament had immediately reſolved to give effectual redreſs to the Petitioners with regard to the laſt point, perhaps Richard might have continued in power ſome time longer. But ſo wiſe a meaſure was not purſued. The Houſe, on this occaſion, endeavoured to ſupport its conſequence by vigorous reſolutions. On the eighteenth of April, a queſtion was propoſed and put, "That, during the ſitting of the Parliament, there "ſhall be no General Council, or Meetings, of the Officers of the army, without the di-"rection, leave, and authority, of his Highneſs the Lord Protector and both Houſes of "Parliament." The diviſion being called for on this Queſtion, it was carried in the affirmative, by a large majority of a hundred and ſixty-three to eighty-ſeven. Another Reſolution, which was agreed to without a diviſion, was, "That no perſon ſhall have, or "continue, any command or truſt, in any of the armies or navies of England, Scotland, "or Ireland, or any of the Dominions or Territories thereunto belonging, who ſhall refuſe "to ſubſcribe, that he will not diſturb, nor interrupt, the free meeting in Parliament of "any of the Members of either Houſe of Parliament, or the freedom in their Debates "and Councils." It was farther reſolved, "That the concurrence of the other Houſe "be deſired to theſe votes." The Commons having thus aſſerted their own authority, and attempted to provide for the perſonal ſecurity of the Members, next voted, That they would take into conſideration how the arrears of the armies and navies might be ſpeedily ſatisfied. All theſe reſolutions were ineffectual. The army was too formidable to be reſiſted; and the grand Council of its Officers, by conſent of the Protector, had aſſembled at Wallingford Houſe. In this exigence, Richard adviſed with his Privy Council, whether it was, or was not, proper to diſſolve the Parliament. Moſt of the Counſellors gave their opinion in favour of its diſſolution; but Whitelocke doubted the ſucceſs of the meaſure, and wiſhed that the Houſes might be permitted to ſit a little longer; eſpecially as the Commons had begun to conſider of raiſing money, by which they might ſoon engage the ſoldiery, and link them faſt to their intereſt. The majority, however, perſiſting in a different ſentiment, the Parliament was diſſolved on the 22d of April, and this act may be regarded as the real determination of Richard's power. He retained, indeed, the name and the appearance of Protector for a few days longer, though without any authority; and his reign, if ſuch it may be called, was finally ended, by the reſolution of the Council of Officers to invite the ſurviving Members of the Long Parliament, who had continued ſitting till the twentieth of April, 1653, to return to the exerciſe and diſcharge of their truſt (m).

(m) Ibid. p. 340—369.

There were not wanting thoſe who adviſed Richard to ſupport himſelf in his dignity by ſanguinary meaſures. They wiſhed him to determine, without ſcruple, to cut off the men who aimed at depriving him of Sovereignty. But neither his moral principles nor his diſpoſition would permit him to retain power at the expence of blood. There is a dialogue upon record, which is ſaid to have paſſed, on this occaſion, between Richard and Colonel Howard; and which is ſo curious, that it ſhall be inſerted below [D]. At the [D] And which is ſo curious, that it ſhall be inſerted below.] The account is as follows. "When Colonel Howard perceived that nothing but vigorous meaſures could ſecure Richard in his Protectorate, from the treachery and ambition of Fleetwood and his other relations, the grandees of the army, he thus addreſſed him: "'Tis time to look about you; "Empire and Command are now the queſtion: your "perſon, your life is in peril; you are the ſon of "Cromwell, ſhew yourſelf worthy to be his ſon. "This buſineſs requires a bold ſtroke, and muſt be "ſupported by a good head. Do not ſuffer yourſelf "to be daunted now, and my head ſhall anſwer for "the conſequence. Fleetwood, Lambert, Deſborough, Vane, are the contrivers of all this: I will "rid you of them; do you ſtand by me, and only "back my zeal for your honour with your name. "The neceſſity of preſerving yourſelf, diſpenſes with "the ſevere laws of juſtice. If this is not done, the "army will be againſt you, and you are infallibly "ruined."

the close of the dialogue it is subjoined, that it is just such a conference as we may suppose to have passed between King Henry the sixth and Queen Margaret. From whomsoever this remark proceeded, we are free to declare that it doth not meet with our approbation. There is a contempt of Richard implied in it, to which we think his conduct is not entitled, and which does not indicate the most exact moral discernment. Surely in the eye of true virtue, it must ever be judged laudable, rather to give up the gratifications of ambition, than to attain them by the perpetration of slaughter and murder. We are persuaded at the same time, that Richard's behaviour was as wise as it was just. If he had followed Colonel Howard's advice, and had ventured to put to death men who stood in the nearest relation to his family, there is not the least probability that he could have secured to himself the permanency of Sovereign power. The bent of the times was against it; the late ill patched frame of Government was growing generally detestable; and people of all ranks, and of very different parties, began anxiously to look for a more settled state of things, in the restoration of the King. It has been thought, with no small appearance of reason, that if Oliver himself had lived much longer, he would not have been able, notwithstanding his extraordinary sagacity, and venturous spirit, to have maintained his usurped greatness. Far less likely, therefore, was it that his son would have been capable of retaining the Sovereignty of this country, even though he had been wicked enough to have adopted the measures proposed by Colonel Howard.

(o) Ibid. p. 168.

There are but few occurrences, during Richard's Administration, that relate personally to himself. The principal one, is the danger he was exposed to by a fall from his horse, as he was taking his favourite diversion of hunting. Through excess of eagerness in the sport, he outrode his retinue; and his horse, either from restiveness, or leaping short, threw him into a ditch, from which he was extricated by a countryman before his guards could come up. This is said to have been the only time in which the good-humoured Sovereign was ever displeased with his attendants (n).

(n) Noble's Memoirs of the Protectoral House of Cromwell, vol. i. p. 164.

No sooner were the Republicans possessed of Government, than they sent to desire Richard to quit the Palace of Whitehall, as not thinking it safe that one who had been invested with Sovereignty should continue in the residence of the ancient Kings, and that too in the Metropolis. He was ordered, likewise, to surrender up his Great Seal, which he accordingly did on the fourteenth of May, when it was broken in pieces. At first he entertained thoughts of flying; but Fleetwood, whom he acquainted with his design, advised him to remain; assuring him that there was no intention of taking away his life, and that a fortune would be settled upon him adequate to his moderate wishes. This might occasion his continuing still at Whitehall, which displeasing the Parliament, the former order to leave it was renewed on the twenty-first of May; but to sweeten the message, the Lord-Chief-Justice St. John, and another Gentleman, were commissioned to promise, that, upon his compliance, provision should be made for the payment of his debts, and an honourable subsistence be procured for himself and family. Upon this he sent a submission in writing, declaring his free acquiescence in the change that had been made, and engaging to demean himself with all peaceableness under the present Government. His act of submission was accompanied with a schedule of his debts. The House being satisfied with this part of his conduct, agreed to the payment of his debts, upon condition that he should peaceably quit Whitehall, and dispose of himself as his private occasions required. To encourage him farther in so doing, they took him under their protection, and resolved that a Committee should be appointed to consider of the most eligible manner of settling upon him a comfortable and honourable subsistence. Richard stood at this time in need of being protected by Parliament, as he now felt all the inconveniences of the involved state of his affairs: for the creditors, to whom he was indebted on account of the pompous funeral of his father, became extremely clamourous; and one of them had the boldness to issue out a writ against him. Nay it has been asserted, that his Palace was surrounded with all the Bailiffs of Middlesex. As the House proceeded slowly in giving effect to the " ruined. And you have nothing to fear: I'll take " it upon myself, and be answerable for the conse" quences."

To this Richard replied; " Every one shall see I
" will do no body any harm. I never have done
" any, nor ever will. I shall be very much troubled
" if any one is injured upon my account; and instead
" of taking away the life of the least person in the " nation for the preservation of my greatness, which " is a burden to me, I would not have a drop of blood
" spilt." " Do you think," replies the Colonel,
" this moderation of your's will repay the wrong
" your family has committed by its elevation?
" Every body knows that, by violence, your father
" procured the death of the late King, and kept his " sons in banishment. If the father's crimes cry
" for vengeance, shall the son have them passed over
" in silence? Mercy in the present state is unrea" sonable. We may shed that blood that strives to " shed our's, without being blood-thirsty, or cruel.
" Though conscience may sometimes obstruct a So" vereign's sacrificing an innocent person to his am" bition, it does not oppose his executing a criminal
" for his own safety. Lay aside this pusillanimity
" so unbecoming the successor of Cromwell. Be " quick, for every moment is precious. Consider " your enemies spend this time in acting, which we " waste in consulting." But, instead of rousing his resentment against his perfidious relations, he returned his thanks for the Colonel's zeal, and said, " talk no " more of it, my resolution is fixed. Violent coun-
" sels suit not with me; and all you can persuade
" me to by what you now give, is, that it proceeds
" from true friendship, for which I am thankful

redreſs and proviſion which had been voted in Richard Cromwell's favour, he ſtill remained at Whitehall; and when, at length, he was obliged to leave it in conſequence of a reſolution that it ſhould be cleared in ſix days of all perſons whomſoever, excepting ſuch as ſhould be allowed by Parliament, he did not retire to his Seat at Hurſley, but went to the Palace of Hampton Court, where he reſided for ſome time. The alarm occaſioned by this ſtep was productive of conſequences that might have been very advantageous to him, had not the ſubſequent changes prevented all farther tranſactions relative to him and his affairs (o).

(o) Ibid. p. 164—168.

During the ſitting of the Long Parliament, and through the frequent revolutions that followed, Richard continued totally inactive. Some, indeed, who had leſs to fear from his Reſtoration than from that of his Majeſty, wiſhed to ſee him Protector again. This is underſtood to have been eſpecially the caſe with regard to Lambert, who is repreſented as having ſtrongly ſolicited Colonel Ingoldſby to join with him in the buſineſs. But the Colonel was convinced that any ſuch attempt was now too late; beſides which, he had already made his peace with the King. On the meeting of the healing Parliament Richard Cromwell retired to Hurſley; and, on the very day in which Charles the Second's return was voted, he reſigned the Chancellorſhip of the Univerſity of Oxford. The reſignation is expreſſed in terms which do honour to his underſtanding and his diſpoſition. It was as follows:

"For the Vice-Chancellor and Convention of the Univerſity of Oxford.

"Gentlemen,

"I ſhall always retain a hearty ſenſe of my former obligations to you in your free "election of me to the office of your Chancellor; and it is no ſmall trouble to my "thoughts, when I conſider how little ſerviceable I have been to you in that relation. "But ſince the All-wiſe Providence of God, (which I deſire always to adore, and bow "down unto) has been pleaſed to change my condition, that I am not in a capacity "to anſwer the ends of the office, I thought I ſhould not be faithful to you, if I did "not reſign it up into your hands, that you might have opportunity to chooſe ſome "other perſon, who, in the preſent ſtate of things, may be more fit and able to ſerve "you. I do hereupon moſt freely reſign and give up all my right and intereſt in that "office; but ſhall always retain my affection and eſteem for you, with my prayers "for your continual proſperity; that, amidſt the many examples of the inſtability and "revolutions of human affairs, you may ſtill abide flouriſhing and fruitful.

"Gentlemen,

"HURSLEY, "Your affectionate friend and ſervant,

"May 8, 1660. R. CROMWELL (p)." (p) Ibid. p. 168, 169. 339.

As Richard was ſenſible how obnoxious he muſt be to a Monarch who was come home to take poſſeſſion of the kingdoms which for ſo many years had been withheld from him, and the Sovereignty of which had been occupied by the Cromwells, he judged it prudent to retire to the Continent. It is remarkable that his name was not mentioned in either Houſe of Parliament; and Lord Clarendon aſſerts, that he fled "more for fear of his debts than of the King; who thought it not neceſſary to enquire after a man ſo long forgotten." He tranſported himſelf to France, and, according to the ſame author, reſided ſome years at Paris, "untaken notice of, and indeed unknown, living in a moſt obſcure condition and diſguiſe, not owning his name, nor having above one ſervant to attend him." When there happened to be a rumour and apprehenſion that a war was likely to fall out between England and France, Richard determined to quit that country, and to remove to ſome neutral place. The city he pitched upon was Geneva, to which he made his way by Bourdeaux, and through the Province of Languedoc. In the courſe of his journey he came to Pezenas, a very pleaſant town belonging to the Prince of Conti, who had a handſome Palace there, at which he then reſided, being at that time the Governor of the Province. "In this place," ſays Lord Clarendon, "Richard made ſome ſtay, and "walking abroad to entertain himſelf with a view of the ſituation, and the many things "worth the ſeeing, he met with a perſon who well knew him, and was well known by "him, the other having always been of his father's, and of his party; ſo that they were "glad enough to find themſelves together. The other told him, that all ſtrangers who "came to that town, uſed to wait upon the Prince of Conti, the Governor of the Pro-"vince, who expected it, and always treated ſtrangers, and particularly the Engliſh, "with much civility: that he need not be known, but that he himſelf would firſt go to "the Prince, and inform him, that another Engliſh Gentleman was paſſing through that "town towards Italy, who would be glad to have the honour to kiſs his hand. The "Prince received him with great civility and grace, according to his natural cuſtom, and, "after a few words, began to diſcourſe of the affairs of England, and aſked many queſtions "concerning the King, and whether all men were quiet, and ſubmitted obediently to him; "which the other anſwered briefly, according to the truth. "Well," ſaid the Prince, "Oliver, though he was a traitor and a villain, was a brave fellow, had great parts, great "courage,

" courage, and was worthy to command; but that Richard, that coxcomb, coquin, pol-
" tron, was ſurely the baſeſt fellow alive. What is become of that fool? How was it
" poſſible he could be ſuch a ſot?" He anſwered, that he was betrayed by thoſe whom
" he moſt truſted, and who had been moſt obliged by his father;" ſo being weary of his
" viſit, quickly took his leave, and the next morning left the town, out of fear that the " Prince might know that he was the very fool and coxcomb he had mentioned ſo kindly.
" And within two days after, the Prince did come to know who it was whom he had " treated ſo well, and whom before, by his behaviour, he had believed to be a man not
" very glad of the King's reſtoration (q)." This pleaſant ſtory has been taken notice of by ſeveral writers; and ſome have made remarks upon it that are favourable to Richard Cromwell. After what has been already ſaid in his vindication, we ſhall only obſerve, that the Prince of Conti appears to have been a man who did not think that ſcruples ſhould hinder any perſon from reſolving to wade through blood and ſlaughter to a throne.

(q) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, and Civil Wars of England, vol. iii. Part 2nd, page 662, 663.

Richard did not continue long at Geneva. The alarm which occaſioned his leaving France proving groundleſs, he returned to that country; where he reſided (with the exception of another ſhort interval ſpent at Geneva, and for the ſame reaſon) till about the year 1680. At this time, having overcome his pecuniary difficulties, and knowing the unpopularity of the Court, he ventured to return to England. The place which he fixed upon for his reſidence was Cheſhunt in Hertfordſhire, a village within twelve miles of London. Here he lived under the name of Richard Clark, Eſq; and was little known, excepting by a few ſelect friends. But though he courted privacy and retirement, he did not abſtain from ſocial intercourſe; making occaſional viſits to his acquaintance, to the moſt intimate of whom he cautiouſly avoided ſpeaking of his former elevation. Dr. Watts, who had frequently been in his company, uſed to ſay, that he never knew him glance at his former ſtation above once, and that in a very diſtant manner (r).

(r) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 172, 173.

It might have been expected that Richard had now weathered every ſtorm, and that he would have deſcended to the grave in peace. This, however, was not the caſe. In 1705, he loſt his only ſon, Oliver, who died on the eleventh of May, having never married. By this event Richard became entitled to a life eſtate in the Manor of Hurſley, which, having been part of his wife's jointure, had devolved to Oliver, in right of his mother. In conſequence of his ſon's deceaſe, the old Gentleman ſent his youngeſt daughter to take poſſeſſion of the eſtate; which ſhe accordingly did; but not, it ſeems, with a view of ſurrendering it to her father. She and her ſiſters, it is ſaid, forgetting their duty, and even the dictates of humanity, refuſed to give it up to him; alledging that he was ſuperannuated, and propoſing to allow him a ſmall yearly ſum. This conduct was the more criminal, as he had ever been very fond of his children, and had treated them with the greateſt tenderneſs and affection. The advanced age of Richard did not prevent him from behaving, on the preſent occaſion, with a becoming ſpirit. He ſcorned to ſubmit to the award of his daughters, and a proceſs at law was the conſequence. As he was obliged to appear in perſon in court, his ſiſter, Lady Fauconberg, ſent her coach and equipage, to conduct him thither. When he came, the judge, remembering his former elevation, conducted him into an apartment where refreſhments were provided for him; and, on his being brought into court, ordered that he ſhould be accommodated with a chair, and that he ſhould ſit covered. One of the Counſel on the other ſide ſeeming diſpoſed to object to this indulgence, the liberal minded magiſtrate immediately replied, " I will allow of no reflections to be made, but that you go to the merits of the cauſe." In concluſion, a decree was given in favour of Richard, accompanied with ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the ſhameful treatment he had received from his daughters. It is underſtood that the Judge was commended by Queen Anne, for the proper attention he had ſhewn to a man who had once been a Sovereign. The principal Counſellor retained by Richard was Thomas Pengelly, Eſq; who, in the reign of George the Firſt, became Chief Baron of the Exchequer. This Gentleman exerted himſelf with uncommon zeal in favour of his Client, and was much approved for his conduct in the affair. There was, at that time, a prevalent report, that he was the natural ſon of his employer. However this may have been; it is certain that a great friendſhip ſubſiſted between Richard Cromwell and Mrs. Pengelly the mother of the Counſellor [E]. As the old Gentleman was going from Weſtminſter Hall, his curioſity led him to viſit the Houſe of Peers. Being aſked there, by a perſon, to whom he was a ſtranger, if he had ever heard or ſeen any thing like it before, he replied, " never ſince I ſat in that Chair," pointing to the Throne (s).

(s) Ibid. p. 173—175.

[E] It is certain that great friendſhip ſubſiſted between Richard Cromwell and Mrs. Pengelly, the mother of the Counſellor.] The report of Sir Thomas Pengelly's having been the natural ſon of Richard, is confirmed by Lord Egmont, in his manuſcript collections. It has been enquired who the Judge was that behaved with ſo much reſpect to the former protector. According to the Earl of Egmont and Mr. Hewling Luſon, it was the Lord Chancellor Cowper. Mr. Granger ſays, that it was the Lord Chief Juſtice Holt. The queſtion depends upon the court in which the cauſe was tried. If the trial was at the King's Bench, Holt was the Judge; if in the Court of Chancery, it muſt have been Lord Cowper. Cowper preſided in the Court of Chancery, from the 11th of October, 1705, to the 25th of September, 1710. We mention this circumſtance, becauſe it has been miſtaken by Mr. Noble (5).

Richard

Richard Cromwell enjoyed a good ſtate of health to the lateſt period of his life; and his activity was ſo great, that at fourſcore, he would gallop his horſe for ſeveral miles together. In his laſt illneſs, and juſt before his departure, he ſaid to his daughters, "Live in "love, I am going to the God of Love." His deceaſe took place on the 12th of July, 1712, in the eighty ſixth year of his age. It is ſomewhat uncertain whether Cheſhunt or Theobalds was the place of his death; but the general account is, that he died at Cheſhunt, at the Houſe of Serjeant Pengelly. His remains were conducted with conſiderable funeral pomp, to Hurſley, and depoſited in the Chancel of that Church, near to thoſe of his Lady. In his laſt will, which was made on the firſt of July, being no more than twelve days before his deceaſe, he remembered ſeveral of his acquaintance; and, among the reſt, he bequeathed to his good friend Mrs. Rachael Pengelly, "the little picture with the gold chain." His ſiſter Mary, Counteſs of Fauconberg, was appointed his executrix. It is obſervable that his daughters are not named in the will. Perhaps he had but a ſmall perſonal fortune, and he knew that they would ſucceed of courſe to the eſtate of Hurſley, which was an ample patrimony. Had he poſſeſſed ever ſo much, their conduct gave them no title to be particularly diſtinguiſhed (t).

(t) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 176, 177.

Very unfavourable, and, in our opinion, very unjuſt accounts have been given, by the generality of writers, of Richard Cromwell's abilities. Such accounts ſeem to have originated, in a great meaſure, from a ſecret contempt which has been entertained of him becauſe he would not ſupport his illegal power by plunging into the deepeſt iniquity. That he had a good underſtanding we truſt has already been ſufficiently evinced: and though he cannot be ſaid to have been of an enterprizing temper, he could behave with ſpirit on proper occaſions. When the army deſerted him, excepting one troop of horſe, ſeeing Whalley's regiment alſo filing off, he opened his breaſt, and deſired them to put an end at once to his misfortunes and his life. At the time in which Fleetwood, Deſborough, and others, endeavoured to perſuade him to diſſolve his Parliament, and even proceeded ſo far as to threaten him if he did not adopt that meaſure, he withſtood all their arguments, menaces, and ſolicitations until the next morning, though he had no perſon near to ſupport him in the conteſt, beſides Secretary Thurloe. A pleaſant magnanimity was diſplayed by him on his quitting Whitehall. Having given ſtrict orders to his ſervants to be very careful of two old trunks which ſtood in his wardrobe, a friend, who was with him, aſked him the reaſon of his particular ſolicitude about them. "Why," replied he, "they contain no leſs than the lives and fortunes of all the good people of England." The trunks were filled with the addreſſes which had been preſented to him, from every part of the kingdom, on his acceſſion to power, and in which the addreſſers promiſed to ſupport him at the expence of all that was near and dear to them. Theſe addreſſes he always carefully preſerved [F]. The general practice of addreſſing commenced on Richard's ſucceeding to the Protectorate (u). It was unfortunate in its origin; but has been wide in its example. The extent to which it has ſince been carried, ſometimes as an engine of policy, ſometimes as the effervеſcence of public ſpirit, and ſometimes as the effect of genuine loyalty, cannot be unknown to our readers.

(u) Ibid. p. 179–181.

Richard Cromwell was repreſented by the Republicans as a man of little religion; one cauſe of which was, his reply to an inferior officer, who had publicly murmured at the advancement of ſome Cavaliers, and was taken to Whitehall to anſwer the charge. "What," ſaid the Protector, in a deriding manner, "would you have me prefer none "but the godly? Here is Dick Ingoldſby, who can neither pray nor preach; and yet "I will truſt him before you all." This, however, only implies that he was aware of the hypocriſy and cant of the times. In a letter which was written, in 1659, to John Winthorpe, Eſq; Governor of Connecticut, in New England, he is deſcribed as a very worthy perſon indeed, of an engaging nature, and religious diſpoſition, paying great reſpect to the beſt of men, miniſters, and others. In the latter part of his life he attended divine worſhip regularly every Sunday. Mr. Neal, who ſays that Richard in his early years had not the zeal for religion, which was then faſhionable, has teſtified that he was a man

[F] Theſe addreſſes he always preſerved.] A curious anecdote on this ſubject was related to the late Rev. George North, Vicar of Codicote, near Welwyn, Herts, by two perſons who converſed with Richard in the laſt years of his life, at Cheſhunt. None were admitted to viſit him, but ſuch as had ſtrong recommendations from ſome of his intimate acquaintance, as being men of an agreeable and chearful converſation, and of ſtrict honour. One of the two perſons juſt mentioned, who lived at Ware, was recommended under this character, and introduced to him, with an admonition to conform to the old Gentleman's peculiarities, without aſking any queſtions, or ſeeming to make obſervations. After an hour or two had been ſpent in converſation, and in drinking, Richard ſtarted up, took the candle, and was followed by the reſt of the company, (who all, excepting the laſt admitted man, knew what was going forward) carrying the bottle and the glaſſes into a dirty garret, where was nothing but a round hair trunk. This Mr. Cromwell pulled out to the middle of the room, and calling for a bumper of wine, drank proſperity to old England. The company did the ſame, when the new gueſt was called to do ſo, ſitting aſtride on the trunk, as all of them had done. Richard deſired him to ſit light, as he had no leſs under him than the lives and fortunes of all the good people of England. The trunk was then opened, and the original addreſſes ſhewed him with great mirth and laughter. Such was Richard's method of initiating a new acquaintance (6). This anecdote was communicated to Mr. Noble by Dr. Lort, to whom ſeveral Biographers, and ourſelves in particular, are ſo greatly indebted.

(6) Noble's Memoirs, ubi ſupra, p. 181, 182.

of great gravity and real piety. However, even in old age, he was ſo far from being an auſtere perſon, that he often gave way to innocent pleaſantry. He poſſeſſed many amiable qualifications, and was much beloved by his friends, with ſome of whom he kept up a correſpondence to his death. Mr. Howe, Mr. White, and Mr. Penn, were in the number of his correſpondents. The firſt of theſe had been his domeſtic Chaplain; and when that Gentleman was upon his death-bed, Richard went to pay him a reſpectful viſit, and to take a laſt farewell of him. It is ſaid that tears were ſhed on both ſides, and that the parting was very ſolemn. From various teſtimonies it appears, that Mr. Cromwell was highly eſteemed in his neighbourhood; that there was no kind of blemiſh upon his character; that he was a perfect Gentleman in his behaviour; and was well acquainted with public affairs (w).

(w) Noble's Mem. ubi ſupra, p. 182—184. Neal's Hiſt. of of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 260.

It is ſomewhat extraordinary that there is no coin or medal of Richard Cromwell. His Great Seal was cut by the inimitable Simon, and has been engraved by Vertue. Some pictures of him are in the poſſeſſion of different perſons; and there are ſeveral prints of him, executed by various hands. Concerning his wife Dorothy, very little is known. So far ſhe has been happy, that amongſt the illiberal things that have been levelled againſt the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell, her character is almoſt the only one that ſcandal has left untouched. It is thought ſhe never ſaw her huſband after he retired to France. She was married at Hurſley, on the firſt of May, 1649; and died on the fifth of January, 1675-6, in the forty-ninth year of her age. The character given of her is, that "ſhe was a prudent, godly, practical Chriſtian (x)."] K.

(x) Noble's Mem. ubi ſupra, p. 185—188. To the ſame work, p. 189—196, we refer for an account of Richard Cromwell's children.

 [CROMWELL (HENRY), the youngeſt ſurviving ſon of the Protector Oliver, and, for a ſhort time, Lord Deputy and Lord Lieutenant of the kingdom of Ireland, was born at Huntingdon on the twentieth of January, 1627-28, and baptized at the Church of All Saints in that town, on the twenty-ninth of the ſame month. His education, together with that of his brothers, was finiſhed at Felſted School, in the county of Eſſex. Being of a military diſpoſition, his father placed him in the army of the Parliament at the age of ſixteen; and, in 1647, when he had not completed his twentieth year, he had riſen to be Captain of the General Sir Thomas Fairfax's Life Guard. In Auguſt, 1649, he accompanied Oliver into Ireland, to quell the Roman catholic Rebellion, having, at that time, attained to the rank of a Colonel. Whilſt he was in this ſervice, he made an attack, in conjunction with Lord Broghill, upon the quarters of the enemy, in which a hundred and ſixty of them were killed. At the ſame time, a hundred and twenty foot, with their officers, and a hundred and fifty gallant horſe, were taken priſoners. This action took place in April, 1650; and in the following year Henry Cromwell aſſiſted at the ſiege of Limerick. When the little, or Barebones Parliament, as it was called, aſſembled, in 1653, he was returned one of the repreſentatives for the kingdom of Ireland. In the ſame year he was ſent again into that Iſland, for the purpoſe of examining its condition, of diſcovering the temper of the people, and of reconciling them to the government of his father. This was a delicate and difficult taſk; but he performed it with admirable wiſdom and diſcretion. The ruling powers, at that time, were the zealous Republicans. With regard to theſe men, Henry Cromwell found, or thought he found, that they had taken more care of themſelves than of the people; and that they were ſo much in love with their power and places, that it would be improper to permit them any longer to retain important ſituations in the kingdom. Upon Ludlow, one of the moſt ſteady and determined amongſt them, he could make no impreſſion. That high ſpirited Gentleman preſerved the conſiſtency of his principles, and would not ſtoop to promiſe ſubjection to the government of a man whom he looked upon as an uſurper, and a betrayer of the cauſe for which they had ſo long been fighting. The Protector, who was well acquainted with the jealous temper of the Republicans, and knew that they would be offended if his ſon affected ſtate and grandeur in his manner of coming to Ireland, ſent him without any other title than plain Henry Cromwell, and he was attended only by one ſervant. However, even the Common wealth party thought proper to receive him with the greateſt ceremony and reſpect. As he landed near Ludlow's country ſeat, that Commander ſent his coach to conduct him thither; and here he was met by his brother-in-law Fleetwood, who, with ſeveral other perſons of rank, came with their carriages, and conveyed him with due ſolemnity to Dublin. Such was Henry Cromwell's behaviour in this viſit to Ireland, that he was highly valued by the people in general of that country; nor was the eſtimation he was held in confined to that kingdom, but extended to England. When, on his return, he arrived at Cheſter, many of the Gentlemen who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in favour of Charles the Firſt, waited upon him to teſtify their regard to his character; and, among the reſt, a Colonel Moſſon, who had been an officer in the King's army. In this interview, the Colonel having aſked Henry how he left Ireland, he replied, "very well, only ſome who are in love with their power muſt be removed." Henry afterwards manifeſted his gratitude for the civilities he had repeatedly received from that Gentleman, by ſtrongly, and we may ſuppoſe effectually interceding for his enlargement, when, in 1658, he was ſecured, together with ſome other other Cavaliers, who had fought during the civil war, in his Majeſty's ſervice (a).

(a) Noble's Memoirs of the Protectoral Houſe of Cromwell, vol. i. p. 197—199.

Soon after Henry Cromwell had returned to England, in 1653, he married a daughter of Sir Francis Ruſſel, Bart. and for ſome time chiefly reſided at Whitehall. Part of 1654 was ſpent by him at his father-in-law's ſeat, at Chippenham in Cambridgeſhire; and in this year he was appointed one of the Viſitors who were ſent by the Protector to the Univerſity of Cambridge. In the ſame year he was choſen one of the Repreſentatives in Parliament for that Univerſity. In 1655, he was again ſent into Ireland, though with no other commiſſion than that of Major General, to prevent the Governors of that kingdom, and Fleetwood in particular, from being diſguſted. When he came to Cheſter, he remained there from the ſecond of June to the twenty-third of the ſame month; and on that day he diſpatched a letter to Thurloe, Secretary of State, acquainting him, that he had been treated, both by the country in his journey, and by the city where he then was, with a great deal of reſpect. From Cheſter he went to Holyhead, where he arrived on the fifth of July. Here he was much concerned to find that there were only two Miniſters in the whole Iſland of Angleſea; and he requeſted that an order might be made to increaſe the number of clergy in that country. During ſome time which he ſpent in theſe weſtern parts of the kingdom, he was conſtantly treated with every mark of eſteem, and particularly by the Cavaliers. This did not appear a little criminal in the eyes of Ludlow, eſpecially as Henry Cromwell was again entertained at Colonel Moſſon's in North Wales, where the ſaid Colonel drank the Protector's health. The ſame author was far from being pleaſed with the welcome reception which Henry met with on his return to Ireland. "Upon his arrival," ſays Ludlow, "in the Bay of Dublin, the men of war "that accompanied him, and other ſhips in the harbour, rung ſuch a peal with their "cannon, as if ſome great good news had been coming to us; and though the uſual "place of landing for thoſe who come in ſhips of war was near my houſe, yet he and "his company went up in boats to the rings end, where they went aſhore, and were "met there by moſt of the officers, civil and military, about town (b)."

Great caution and ſecrecy were uſed by Henry Cromwell, for ſome time, to cover the real buſineſs on which he was ſent; and it was at firſt thought that he only came over to command the army as Major-General, under Lieutenant-General Fleetwood. But by degrees his deſigns became more and more apparent. At length, when he found that it would be impoſſible any longer to curb the ſpirit of the Republicans, who were ſecretly ſupported by Fleetwood, he produced a commiſſion by which he was conſtituted Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and Commander in Chief in that kingdom. However, to qualify what it was known would be diſtaſteful to many perſons, others were joined with him in the adminiſtration of civil affairs. But nothing could reconcile the minds of the officers of the army. As they had long been accuſtomed to oppreſs the natives, and to advance their own fortunes by the confiſcation of the eſtates of the Iriſh, they were far from approving the government of one who was likely to put a ſtop to their exceſſes. Beſides this, Henry did not view their political ſentiments in the moſt favourable light. He wiſhed, by moderation and condeſcenſion, to unite the whole kingdom, and to conciliate the affections of the different parties to each other. To fruſtrate, therefore, his deſigns, the officers had the boldneſs to petition the Protector to reſtore their old Chief Governor, Fleetwood, who coincided with them in their principles, and whoſe weak underſtanding they could eaſily render ſubſervient to their projects. In this criſis Henry conducted himſelf with no ſmall degree of prudence and addreſs. The petition of the officers was counteracted by another of the oppoſite party in favour of the new Lord Deputy; and in a letter from the Church of Dublin, to Oliver, ſigned by many of the Miniſters, an entire approbation is given of his ſon's conduct; for his equal juſtice; his mercy to the poor; his charity to all good men, though different in religious ſentiments; and for the reſpect and reverence he ſhewed for religion. Indeed, Henry Cromwell, by the liberal and equitable ſpirit of his adminiſtration, by his impartiality and benevolence, ſoon reconciled the Iriſh to their Governor. Though the nation was depopulated and exhauſted, and, at the ſame time, oppreſſed with aſſeſſments; though the military eſtabliſhment could not be ſupported, and the partiality of Oliver to the officers who had eſpouſed his cauſe, prevented any ſcheme of a reduction; though his grants to particular creatures impoveriſhed the revenue; and though in conſequence of the other urgent concerns of the Protector, the affairs of Ireland were ſometimes totally neglected; amidſt all theſe difficulties, Henry acted with ſo much ſkill and vigour for the public welfare, that the country was in a far more happy and proſperous condition than it had been for a long ſeries of years. His father ſaid, that his ſon was a Governor from whom he himſelf might learn. So firmly did the Lord Deputy eſtabliſh his authority in the hearts of a people, who were ingenuous enough to acknowledge the merits of his adminiſtration, that they were entirely reconciled to the intereſts of Oliver. When a petition was ſent to Oliver from the officers of his own regiment, avowing their diſſatisfaction with his ſon's Government, addreſſes were tranſmitted from the army and the inhabitants of every county in Ireland, expreſſing their reſolution of adhering to the Protector againſt all thoſe whoſe particular animoſities endeavoured to re-embroil the public. But notwithſtanding theſe flattering flattering teſtimonies in Henry's favour, and the eſteem which he, in general, acquired by his wiſe and zealous meaſures for the common benefit, he was ſurrounded with ſo many embarraſſments, that his letters are full of complaints; and he declared his wiſh to Secretary Thurloe, that he might be permitted to lay down his office, and retire to a private life (c).

On the death of his father, with which event Henry appears to have been deeply affected, he took care to have his brother Richard's acceſſion to the Protectorate proclaimed and acknowledged with all due ſolemnity in Ireland; and the ſame aſſurances of ſupport were renewed to the new Sovereign, which had been given to Oliver. The ſatisfaction and joy in Ireland, upon the occaſion, was as general and as great as they had been in England. There is no doubt but that Henry contributed principally to this; not only by his power as Governor, but by the influence ariſing from the popularity of his character. He was, indeed, very zealous for the intereſts of his brother, which he diſplayed, among other inſtances, in giving ſuch advice to him and to Fleetwood, as reflects no ſmall credit upon the ſoundneſs of his own underſtanding, and the goodneſs of his heart [A]. His Commiſſion to the Government of Ireland was now renewed under the title of Lord-Lieutenant. However, it was an addition of honour only, and not of advantage, that was gained by this title. On the contrary, the new commiſſion was ſo modified by the Privy Council, and contained ſo many reſtrictions and limitations, that Henry had much reaſon to be diſſatisfied. When the Intelligence was brought of the diſſolution of Richard's Parliament, and the intrigues at Wallingford-Houſe, the Lord-Lieutenant exerted himſelf

[A] As reflects no ſmall credit upon the ſoundneſs of his underſtanding, and the goodneſs of his heart.] What is aſſerted above will be confirmed by two letters which have been preſerved by Mr Neal, in his hiſtory of the Puritans; the firſt written to Richard, the ſecond to Fleetwood. They are as follows:

"In his letter of October 20, 1658, he ſays, if the account be true which I have received of the ſtate of affairs in England, I confeſs it is no more than I looked for; only I had ſome hopes it might have been prevented by keeping all officers at their reſpective charges; but as things now ſtand, I doubt the flood is ſo ſtrong you can neither ſtem it, nor come to an anchor, but muſt be content to go adrift and expect the ebb. I thought thoſe whom my father had raiſed from nothing would not ſo ſoon have forgot him, and endeavour to deſtroy his family before he is in his grave. Why do I ſay I thought, when I know ambition, and affectation of empire never had any bounds. I cannot think theſe men will ever reſt till they are in the ſaddle; and we have of late years been ſo uſed to changes, that it will be but a nine day's wonder; and yet I fear there is no remedy, but what muſt be uſed gradually and pedetentim. Sometimes I think of a parliament, but am doubtful whether ſober men will venture to embark themſelves when things are in ſo high a diſtraction; or if they would, whether the army can be reſtrained from forceing elections.—I am almoſt afraid to come over to your highneſs, leſt I ſhould be kept there, and ſo your highneſs loſe this army, which, for ought I know, is the only ſtay you have, though I cannot but earneſtly deſire it. I alſo think it dangerous to write freely to you, for I make no queſtion but all the letters will be opened that paſs between us, unleſs they come by a truſty meſſenger. I pray God help you, and bleſs your councils.

"I remain, yours, &c.

"H. C."

"Dear Brother,

"I received your account of the petition of the officers; but pray give me leave to expoſtulate with you; how came theſe two or three hundred officers together? If they came of their own heads, their being abſent from their charge without licenſe would have flown in their face when they petitioned for a due obſervance of martial diſcipline. If they were called together, were they not alſo taught what to ſay and do? If they were called, was it with his highneſs's privity? If they met without leave in ſo great a number, were they told their error? I ſhall not meddle with the matter of their petition; but, dear brother, I muſt tell you, I hear that dirt was thrown upon his late highneſs at that great meeting: that they were exhorted to ſtand up for that good old cauſe which had long lain aſleep. I thought my father had purſued it to the laſt. He died, praying for thoſe that deſired to trample on his duſt. Let us then not render evil for good, and make his memory ſtink before he is under ground. Let us remember his laſt legacy, and for his ſake render his ſucceſſor conſiderable, and not make him vile, a thing of nought, and a by-word. Whither do theſe things tend? What a hurly-burly is there? One hundred independant miniſters called together; a council, as you call it, of two or three hundred officers of a regiment. Remember what has always befallen impoſing ſpirits. Will not the loins of an impoſing independent, or anabaptiſt, be as heavy as the loins of an impoſing prelate, or preſbyter? And is it a dangerous opinion, that dominion is founded in grace, when it is held by the church of Rome, and a ſound principle when it is held by the fifth monarchy men. Dear brother, let us not fall into the ſins of other men, leſt we partake of their plagues. Let it be ſo carried, that all the people of God, though under different forms; yea, even thoſe whom you count without, may enjoy their birthright and civil liberty; and that no one party may tread upon the neck of another. It does not become the magiſtrate to deſcend into parties; but can the things you do tend to this end? Can theſe things be done, and the world not think his highneſs a knave or a fool, or oppreſſed with mutinous ſpirits? Dear brother, my ſpirit is ſorely oppreſſed with the conſideration of the miſerable ſtate of the innocent people of theſe nations: what have theſe ſheep done that their blood ſhould be the price of our luſt and ambition? Let me beg you to remember, how his late highneſs loved you; how he honoured you with the higheſt truſt, by leaving the ſword in your hand, which muſt defend or deſtroy us. And his declaring his highneſs his ſucceſſor, ſhews, that he left it there to preſerve him and his reputation. O brother! uſe it to curb extravagant ſpirits, and buſy-bodies, but let not the nations be governed by it. Let us take heed of arbitrary power; let us be governed by the known laws of the land; and let all things be kept in their proper channels; and let the army be ſo governed, that the world may never hear of them unleſs there be occaſion to fight. And truly, brother, you muſt pardon me, if I ſay God and man may require this duty at your hand, and lay all miſcarriages of the army, in point of diſcipline, at your doors. You ſee I deal freely and plainly with you, as becomes your friend, and a good ſubject. And the great God, in whoſe preſence I ſpeak, knows that I do it not to reproach you, but out of my tender affection and faithfulneſs to you. And you may reſt aſſured, that you ſhall always find me, ſelf with peculiar vigour to ſupport the tottering power of his brother; and on the reſtoration of the Rump Parliament, he laboured to prevent the diſorders which might ariſe from ſo ſudden a revolution. A proclamation was iſſued by him to preſerve the peace; and after a conſultation with his officers, he ſent agents to the Council of State in England, with propoſals relative to the civil and military government of Ireland. Theſe propoſals being referred to the Parliament, ſome ordinances were made for the benefit of the adventurers and ſoldiers; and at the ſame time it was reſolved, that the country ſhould again be put into the hands of Commiſſioners; that Henry Cromwell ſhould be recalled; and that Ludlow ſhould be appointed to command the forces of the Commonwealth in that kingdom. Henry had already declared to Fleetwood, "that, although he could not promiſe ſo "much affection to the late changes as others very honeſtly might, becauſe he could not "promote any thing which inferred a diminution of his late father's honour and merit, yet "he had ſuch a tenderneſs for peace as to be content with the preſent Government; and, "therefore he thought it his duty to prevent thoſe fears and jealouſies which might give "occaſion to interrupt the public peace, by reſigning his charge to any one whom they "ſhould ſend to receive it." The new Commiſſioners were either not acquainted with his ſentiments, or ſuſpected his ſincerity. They were ſenſible, at the ſame time, of his abilities, his popularity, and his power in Ireland; and hence were led to imagine that he would retain his authority by force. Their fears in this reſpect were groundleſs: for when Sir Hardreſs Waller was employed to ſurprize the Caſtle of Dublin, he was admitted without the leaſt oppoſition, and Henry Cromwell retired to a Houſe in Phœnix Park. He had adminiſtered the government with ſo great a diſregard to his private intereſt, that he could not immediately command as much money as would be ſufficient to defray the expences of his voyage to England. Indeed, ſuch was the integrity of his diſpoſition, that, in a letter to his brother, he could ſay, "I will rather ſubmit to any ſufferings with "a good name, than be the greateſt man upon earth without it (d)."

"Your true friend, and loving brother,

After Henry Cromwell had arrived in England, and waited on the Parliament, he retired into the country, where he continued without taking any part in the various ſucceeding revolutions. He probably thought himſelf happy in quitting a ſtation, which, though elevated and ſplendid, had been expoſed to ſo many difficulties that it never afforded him any ſatisfaction. It is underſtood, that he was far from being diſpleaſed with his Majeſty's reſtoration. When that event happened, he was not only included in the Act of Indemnity, but appears to have received ſome mark of favour from the King, of which he expreſſed a very grateful ſenſe, in a letter to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, through whoſe interpoſition the benefit was obtained [B]. For ſome years Henry Cromwell reſided with his father and brother in-law, Sir Francis and Sir John Ruſſel; after which he removed to his eſtate at Spinney Abbey, near Soham, in Cambridgeſhire, a very retired ſituation. In the houſe belonging to this eſtate, which was worth between five and ſix hundred pounds a year, he ſpent the remainder of his days, deſcending from the toilſome grandeur of governing men, to the humble and happy occupation of huſbandry. There is a tradition that he was once honoured with a viſit from King Charles the Second, when his Majeſty was returning from Newmarket [C].

And your lordſhip (being above makeing an intereſt by trampling upon the fallen, or by being bitter againſt things that come to paſ by God's ſecret providence) have moſt nobly and chriſtianly patronized me in it, even to ſucceſſe; and for this, in a few words. I give your lordſhip my eternall thanks and prayers.

"I might, perhaps, have better expreſſed theſe my ſentiments ſome other way; yet I have preſumed to doe it thus, by a letter, that there may remayne a teſtimony of infamy upon mee, if ever I abuſe the admirable mercy I have found, either by future diſloyalty to his majeſty, or ingratitude to your lordſhip. And I wiſh your lordſhip would add one favour more, which is to aſſure his moſt excellent majeſty, and his royal highnes (how hard, or needleſs ſoever it be to beleeve me) that few can wiſh their royall perſons, family, or intereſt, more proſperity and eſtabliſhment, then doth,

[C] There is a tradition that he once was honoured with a viſit from King Charles the Second, when his Majeſty was returning from Newmarket.] The ſtory, as related by Mr. Noble, we ſhall give in his own words.

"In this employment (huſbandry) he was diſ-"covered by his Sovereign King Charles the Second, "who, in returning from Newmarket, in the month "of September, 1671, expreſſing his wiſh to call at "ſome houſe and take refreſhment, Lord Inchiquin, "Henry's brother-in-law, then with his Majeſty, "obſerved, that there was a very honeſt Gentleman "in the neighbourhood, that would think it an ho-"nour to entertain his Majeſty, which the King was "pleaſed with, and deſired him to conduct them to "his friend's ſeat. When they came into the farm-"yard (which led to the houſe) his Lordſhip, taking "up a muck-fork, and throwing it over his ſhoulder, "went before Mr. Cromwell, who was then in the "yard, and wondering at ſo large a company's com-"ing ſo unexpectedly upon him, and ſtill more at

The death of Henry Cromwell was occaſioned by that dreadful diſorder, the ſtone. His Majeſty being informed of his illneſs by the Earl of Suffolk, expreſſed his regard for him, enquired into the particulars of his complaint, and recommended that certain drops ſhould be given him, of which the King, who had a chemical turn, entertained a high opinion. It was on the twenty-third of March, 1673-74, that Henry departed this life, and in the forty-ſeventh year of his age. Two days after his deceaſe, he was buried within the Communion-Rails of Wicken-Church, cloſe to his mother. After the Reſtoration, he conformed to the Church of England, and died in that Communion. This, however, did not prevent his retaining a great regard for the Nonconformiſts. To Richard Parr, M. A. the ejected Vicar of Chippenham, he afforded a ſeaſonable aſſylum; and it is certain that moſt, if not all, of his deſcendants continued among the Proteſtant Diſſenters. The teſtimonies to the excellence of Henry Cromwell's character are numerous and deciſive. Dr. Leland ſays, that he was penetrating, juſt, and generous. Mr. Neal declares, that he was a wiſe and diſcreet Governor; that, by his prudent conduct, he kept the Iriſh in awe; that he brought that nation into a flouriſhing condition; and that he behaved with ſuch a generous impartiality, as gained him the eſteem even of the Royaliſts themſelves. Cardinal Mazarine acknowledged, that he admired him very much. Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper, in a letter to him, ſaid, "You may have many who love his Highneſs's ſon, but "I love Henry Cromwell, were he naked, without all thoſe glorious additions and titles, "which, however, I pray may continue and be encreaſed on you." And the late Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; ſo long Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, than whom no one was a better judge of characters, was of opinion, "that he was truly a great man, and might paſs for "a great man in thoſe great days (e)." It is remarkable, that there is no engraved portrait or medal of ſo eminent a perſon. Oliver Cromwell, Eſq; of Eſſex-ſtreet, in the Strand, the ſole male-deſcendant of the family now living, has an original picture of him; the only one, he thinks, that is known (f). Mr. Noble, however, has mentioned others. Elizabeth, Henry's Lady, was a woman of exemplary conduct, and elegant manners. She is ſaid to be ſtill remembered in the neighbourhood, by the appellation of the good Lady Cromwell. It is related, that, before her marriage, ſhe had a diſlike to the Protector Oliver; but that, upon her union with the family, all her prejudice was removed, and changed into a very affectionate eſteem for her father-in-law, as the moſt amiable of parents. She ſurvived her huſband ſome years; and dying on the ſeventh of April, 1687, at the age of fifty-two, was buried cloſe to him, in the Church of Wicken (g). For an account of Henry Cromwell's poſterity, we refer, as before, to Dr. Gibbons, to Hughes's Letters, to the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, and to Mr. Noble.

"Thus," ſays the author to whom we have ſo often referred, "the Protectorate Houſe "of Cromwell may not be improperly repreſented as a river, which taking its riſe in the "mountains of Wales, continued long in that Principality; when gently gliding down "the hills of Glamorganſhire, and meandring through various countries, it arrived at the "Imperial Thames; where, having gained great ſtrength, and enlarged its bounds, it "changed its ancient name, and turning its courſe North-Eaſt, rolled on into Hunting-"donſhire, where it loitered a conſiderable time and divided itſelf into various branches. "One of the leaſt of them ſuddenly burſting its banks, ſwelled itſelf into a tremendous "river, which not only ſwallowed up the main ſtream, but at length overflowed three "mighty nations; and by its rapidity, and dreadful violence, ſpread terror throughout the "globe; when it as ſilently, and ſuddenly, returned to far leſs than its original limits; "leaving, however, many noble branches behind it. Ever ſince it has ſoftly murmured "on towards the South; where, inſtead of its former boundleſs current, it is now only "admirable for the clearneſs and goodneſs of its ſtream (h).] K.

"this ceremony of the muck-fork. Nor was the "King without his ſurprize. What, ſays his Ma-"jeſty of Fun, is the reaſon of this? "Why, Sire, "ſays the muck-fork bearer, this Gentleman, be-"fore whom I carry this inſtrument of huſbandry, "is Mr. Henry Cromwell, to whom I had the honour "of being mace-bearer, when he was in Ireland. "Charles laughed, poor Mr. Cromwell was con-"founded; but the eaſe of the Sovereign diſſipated "all diſquietude. The hungry company were treat-"ed with what the hoſpitable Henry had, and they "departed with good humour and pleaſure on all "ſides (3)." Mr. Noble informs us, that this ſtory was communicated by the Rev. Edward Turner, of Burwell, in Cambridgeſhire; and adds, that he has reaſon to ſuppoſe that Mr. Turner is right in his relation, becauſe he is a very curious Gentleman, reſides near the place, and is ſome way allied to the Cromwells. Anecdotes make ſo admirable a figure in convivial intercourſe, and are ſo much ſought for, and delighted in at preſent, that it is an unpleaſing employment to weigh them in too nice a balance. Nevertheleſs, a regard for truth obliges us to point out the incongruities of the above ſtory. We would aſk, in the firſt place, how Lord Inchiquin came to be Henry's brother-in-law? No ſuch circumſtance occurs in all Mr. Noble's elaborate reſearches into the affinities of the Cromwell family. Secondly, was it likely that the eldeſt ſon of a Peer (for the Earl of Inchiquin's father was living at the time of Henry's adminiſtration in Ireland) ſhould condeſcend to the humble office of being mace-bearer to the Lord Lieutenant? Thirdly, there is good reaſon to believe, that this Nobleman, at that very time, reſided abroad with his father. Fourthly, it is probable that Lord Inchiquin, in September, 1671, was at Tangier, of which he was Governor. The fact, we apprehend, is, that, on ſome occaſion or other, King Charles the Second was at Henry Cromwell's houſe; but the circumſtances of the viſit cannot now be aſcertained.

 [CROXALL (SAMUEL), a Divine of the Church of England, and author of ſeveral ingenious productions, was born at Walton upon Thames in Surrey (a); but in what year we are unable to aſcertain. He was ſon of the Rev. Mr. Samuel Croxall, Rector of Hanworth, Middleſex, and Vicar of Walton (b). He was educated at Eton School, and from thence was removed to St. John's College, Cambridge. It is ſuppoſed to have been while he was at the Univerſity, that he became enamoured of Mrs. Anna-Maria Mordaunt, to whom he afterwards addreſſed his "Fair Circaſſian," in a dedication, expreſſive of an ardent paſſion, but written in a very bombaſtic ſtile, and with expreſſions that bordered on profaneneſs. Having early imbibed an attachment to the Whig intereſt, he employed his pen in favour of that party during the latter end of Queen Anne's reign; and publiſhed "Two original Cantos, in imitation of Spenſer's Fairy Queen," as a ſatire on the Earl of Oxford's adminiſtration (c). In 1715, he addreſſed a Poem to the Duke of Argyle, upon his obtaining a victory over the rebels; and the ſame year publiſhed "The Viſion," a poem, addreſſed to the Earl of Halifax. It was in the year 1720, that he publiſhed "The Fair Circaſſian [A]," in 4*to*. but without his name, as he was then probably in orders, and did not think it prudent openly to avow ſuch a performance. Soon after he quitted the univerſity, he was inſtituted to the Vicarage of Hampton in Middleſex (d); and in 1722, he publiſhed, "Fables of Æſop, and others, tranſlated into "Engliſh: with inſtructive applications [B]." This collection of fables was well received,

[A] The Fair Circaſſian.] A ſmall part of this poem was firſt printed in Steele's Miſcellanies, and has been ſince re-printed by Mr. Nichols, in his Select Collection of Poems, vol. iv. p. 120. The Fair Circaſſian is a very free tranſlation, or imitation, of Solomon's Song. As a poetical compoſition it has conſiderable merit, but it is too licentious in its tendency. The eighth edition was printed in 1765. Though Mr. Croxall publiſhed it without his name, and only as written by "a Gentleman Commoner of "Oxford," yet it was ſome years after known to be his, and he was attacked for it with great ſeverity by Mr. Cragg, one of the Miniſters of the city of Edinburgh, who publiſhed a ſmall volume of Spiritual Poems, in one of which are the following lines:

'Curſed be he that the Circaſſian wrote,
'Periſh his fame, contempt be all his lot
'Who baſely durſt in execrable ſtrains,
'Turn holy myſteries into impious ſcenes.'

Mr. Cragg alſo expreſſed great indignation at the author of the "Fair Circaſſian," for having 'proſtituted his muſe to the purpoſes of lewdneſs, in 'converting the Song of Solomon into an amorous 'dialogue between a king and his miſtreſs,' and he obſerved, that he could not have expected 'ſuch pro'fanation from a Clergyman (1).'

(1) Lives of the Poets, vol. v. p. 291, 292.

It is obſerved in the notes to the Bible of the Meſſieurs of Port Royal, that Solomon's Song is a 'ſpi'ritual Epithalamium, in which Solomon, animated 'by the ſpirit of God, ſings the praiſes of Jeſus 'Chriſt, and of the Church.' Another writer, after taking notice that there have been various opinions reſpecting the deſign of Solomon's Song, remarks, that 'the moſt generally received is, that we are not 'to ſtick in the primary, and literal ſenſe of this 'book of Solomon, and ſo look upon it as nothing 'but the fond dictates of an earthly paſſion; but we 'are to ſearch for a ſecondary, and a ſpiritual mean'ing; and as the mutual affection of Chriſt, and his 'Church, is frequently in other parts of ſcripture 'deſcribed to us by the tender, and reciprocal affec'tion of the married ſtate, we are to conſider this 'book as a myſtical account of the ſpiritual eſpouſals 'of Chriſt and the Faithful, and to explain the ſeve'ral parts of it by this key (2).' But it is well known that the learned Sebaſtian Caſtalio maintained, that the Song of Solomon was a profane piece, and as ſuch ought to be left out of the canon of ſcripture; and others have adopted ſimilar ſentiments. It has been conſidered as an amorous Paſtoral. The writer, who has been juſt quoted, ſays, 'We may, without any 'heſitation, aſſert, that it is of the paſtoral kind. 'There are not, indeed, totidem verbis, ſhepherds and 'ſhepherdeſſes introduced in it. The perſonages, it 'muſt be confeſſed, are of a more diſtinguiſhed cha'racter. But yet the ſcenes are entirely paſtoral, and 'the ſentiments of this piece are evidently ſuch as are 'not near ſo agreeable to any other way of writing. 'We have every where in it vineyards, flocks, flowers, 'birds, trees, gardens, fountains, love, beauty, ſim'plicity, and nature. Nay all its ideas are in a 'manner borrowed from rural ſcenes. At leaſt, there 'are as few inſtances of this rule's being tranſgreſſed, 'as there are in any of the antient paſtorals (3).'— 'It is not improbable, that ſome of the favourers of 'the myſtical interpretation were induced to enter'tain ſuch ſentiments ſolely by finding it among the 'ſacred writings; from whence they but too eaſily 'agreed, that it muſt of neceſſity be explained in this 'allegorical manner; foraſmuch as, if they did not 'look beyond the bare letter of it, it could not be 'thought to have been with any propriety ranked 'among the inſpired volumes (4).'—'The Jews of 'the age of Solomon, out of an affectionate regard to 'their illuſtrious monarch, thought every thing of 'his compoſing ought to be preſerved and given down 'to poſterity, and as they preſerved his Proverbs as a 'monument of his wiſdom, and Eccleſiaſtes of his re'pentance, they probably choſe this out of many 'others to be kept, as a proof of his gallantry and 'politeneſs. But Rabbins and Targumiſts after'wards aroſe in Iſrael, who knew not Solomon, and 'being fond of ſhewing their deep penetration, gave 'it a new and figurative ſenſe, and immediately 'ranked it among their authentic ſcripture (5).'

The ſame writer alſo obſerves, that if the Song of Solomon be conſidered only as a mere human compoſition, 'the whole, and every part of it, conſidered 'only in that light, is as eaſy, conſiſtent, and intel'ligible, as can reaſonably be expected in a piece of 'ſuch antiquity (6).'—'There are allegories in other 'parts of ſcripture; yet in the very obſcureſt of them 'there is always ſomething to fix and aſcertain the 'deſign of the author, and to aſſiſt us in inveſtigating 'their meaning. But is this the caſe with the Song 'of Solomon? Is there, through the whole, any the 'leaſt hint given us, that it relates to Chriſt, and his 'Church? or that the Beloved, that is ſpoken of, is 'any other, than Solomon himſelf; or the Fair, that 'is celebrated, any other than his Bride (7)?' This writer alſo remarks, that the name of God is never once mentioned in Solomon's Song, and that this poem is no where quoted, or referred to in the New Teſtament. 'A pure and heavenly flame,' ſays he, 'ſhines through every other part of the Sacred Writ'ings; but who, without doing the greateſt violence 'to reaſon, can diſcover, in this book, any thing but 'a mere earthly paſſion (8)?'

[B] Fables of Æſop, and others, &c.] In his dedication of this collection to the young Lord Sunbury, ſon to the Earl of Halifax, he ſays, 'Theſe fables 'abound in variety of inſtruction, moral and political. 'They furniſh us with rules for every ſtation of life. 'They mark out a proper behaviour for us, both in 'reſpect of ourſelves and others; and demonſtrate to 'us, by a kind of example, every virtue which claims 'our ed, and has been much uſed in ſchools. The ninth edition, in 12*mo.* was printed in 1770. Mr. Croxall alſo wrote all the dedications prefixed to the "Select Novels," printed for Watts in 1729 (e). He was likewiſe concerned, with ſeveral others, in the tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, of which he performed the ſtory of Niſus and Scylla, the Labyrinth, the funeral of Memnon, Dædalus and Icarus, part of the fable of Cypariſſus, and the greateſt part of the eleventh book (f). In February, 1730-31, he was inſtituted to the united pariſhes of St. Mary Somerſet and St. Mary Mountſhaw, in London, which he held till his death. He was alſo Chancellor, Prebendary, Canon Reſidentiary, and Portioniſt of the Church of Hereford, and became Doctor in Divinity. In 1732, he was appointed Chaplain to the King, and was made Archdeacon of Salop in the Dioceſe of Hereford; in 1734, he obtained the Vicarage of Selleck in Herefordſhire; and the following year he publiſhed, in one volume, 8*vo.* 'Scripture Politics: Being a View of the 'Original Conſtitution, and ſubſequent Revolutions, in the Government, religious and 'civil, of that People, out of whom the Saviour of the World was to ariſe: as it is con-'tained in the Bible.' In this work he treats of the Moſaic law, of the Holy Land, the origin of the people of Iſrael, their forms of government, their military affairs, and their religious rites, ceremonies, and eccleſiaſtical officers. It is not a performance of much erudition [C], and ſeems chiefly intended to render the Old Teſtament more eaſily underſtood by ordinary readers. In 1750, he publiſhed a poem, entitled, "The Royal Manual;" which he ſtated, in the preface, to be the production of Andrew Marvel; but it was ſuppoſed to have been written by himſelf (g). A poem, called, "Colin's Miſtakes," which has been lately re-printed by Mr. Nichols (h), has alſo been attributed to Dr. Croxall. He is reported to have chiefly governed the Church of Hereford during the old age of Biſhop Egerton; and it is ſaid, that he pulled down an old ſtone chapel, adjoining to the Palace, and with the materials built part of a houſe for his brother, Mr. Rodney Croxall (i). Dr. Croxall died, at a very advanced age, on the 13th of February, 1752 (k).] T.

Dr. Croxall, in the courſe of his life, publiſhed ſix ſingle Sermons. The firſt was preached in 1715, from John xiii. 35, and entitled, "Incendiaries no Chriſtians;" the ſecond in 1723, from Iſaiah xxxviii. 18, 19; the third in 1724, from 1 Timothy iv. 6, at the Conſecration of Biſhop Egerton; the fourth on the 30th of January, 1730, before the Houſe of Commons, from Proverbs xxv. 5; the fifth in 1738, from 2 Samuel xii. 7; the title of which is, "The Royal Sin, or Adultery in a King rebuked;" and the ſixth in 1741, from Pſalm lxxxvii. 7. on the Antiquity, Dignity, and Advantages of Muſick (m).

A late author has cenſured Dr. Croxall's Fables, as being above the comprehenſion of thoſe by whom alone they are read, and, at the ſame time, as compoſed in a very mean ſtyle. With regard to his ordinary mode of expreſſion, the writer adds, that it aims at humour without reaching it; that it is totally deſtitute of that elegant ſimplicity in which a narrative of this kind ſhould be preſented to children; and that it were eaſy to fill a volume with the vulgariſms and abſurdities of Croxall's Æſopian Fables (n). The book, however, is ſtill in the poſſeſſion of the ſchools.] K.

'our beſt regards, and every vice which we are moſt 'concerned to avoid.' In the applications of theſe Fables, Dr. Croxall has introduced ſundry remarks, in order to inſtil into the minds of youth ſentiments of civil liberty, and has made many uſeful obſervations on life and manners.

[C] Not a performance of much erudition.] In his preface, Dr. Croxall ſays, 'The whole ſcope of the 'Sacred Writings, from the beginning to the end, 'appears evidently to be but this one, The ſalvation 'of mankind through Jeſus Chriſt. Which being at-'tainable only by a proper faith, and a good moral 'life, the Bible contains nothing but what relates to 'one or the other of theſe; nothing but genealogies, 'types, predictions, and demonſtrations, concerning 'the Meſſiah; and inſtitutions, precepts, exhortations, 'and examples, for living righteouſly. Therefore, 'that I might not burthen, either the reader or my-'ſelf, with more than was neceſſary, and perhaps ſafe 'upon this occaſion, I have omitted conſulting any 'of thoſe very learned authors who have written 'profeſſedly upon the ſame ſubject, except Sigonius; 'and him, more for method than any thing elſe; 'keeping as cloſe as poſſible to the expreſs ſenſe and 'meaning of the ſcriptures; which I take to be the 'beſt, if not the only allowable interpreters of what 'themſelves contain (9).']

CUDWORTH (RALPH), a very learned and rational Divine, ſon of Ralph Cudworth, D. D. Rector of Aller in the County of Somerſet [A], was born at Aller in 1617.

[A] Son of Ralph Cudworth, &c.] He [the father] was at firſt Fellow of Emanuel College and Rector of St. Andrew's in Cambridge, then Vicar of Coggeſhall in Eſſex, and afterwards Rector of Aller, and Chaplain to

1617 (a). His mother was of the family of Machell, and had been nurſe to Prince Henry, eldeſt Son of King James I. After Dr. Cudworth's death, which happened in Auguſt or September, 1624 (b); ſhe married again to Dr. Stoughton, an eminent Preacher in thoſe times, who took a particular care of his ſon-in-law's education. He diſcovered from the firſt a quick and penetrating genius, and made ſo good progreſs in his ſtudies, that at the age of thirteen he was admitted Penſioner of Emanuel College [B]: however, he was not matriculated as a Student in the Univerſity till July 5th, 1632. What proficiency he made there in all kinds of learning, particularly in Philoſophy, his excellent Works do abundantly teſtify. In 1639 he took the degree of Maſter of Arts; and about the ſame time being choſen Fellow of his College, he became ſo eminent a Tutor, that he had eight-and-twenty Pupils at once; a thing never known before even in the largeſt Colleges in the Univerſity. Among them was the famous William Temple, afterwards created a Baronet (c). Not long after, he was preſented by Emanuel College to the Rectory of North-Cadbury in Somerſetſhire, a living worth near three hundred pounds a year, and probably kept it till the year 1656 (d). The firſt things he publiſhed were, A diſcourſe concerning the true Notion of the Lord's Supper; and, The Union of Chriſt and the Church ſhadowed, or in a ſhadow, printed at London in 1642. About 1644 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity [C], and the ſame year he was choſen Maſter of Clare-Hall, in the room of Dr. Paſke who was ejected; where he had the honour of having under his care the celebrated John Tillotſon. The next year, Dr. Metcalfe reſigning his place of Regius Profeſſor of Hebrew, Mr. Cudworth, who was a great maſter of the oriental languages, was unanimouſly appointed, on the 15th of October, to ſucceed him. From this time he applied himſelf entirely to his academical employments and ſtudies; and read his public lectures every Wedneſday; the firſt being upon the ſtructure and plan of the Temple of Jeruſalem. In 1647 he printed, at Cambridge, a Sermon on 1 John ii. 3, 4. which he had preached, the 31ſt of March of the ſame year, before the Houſe of Commons at Weſtminſter [D]. In 1651, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (e). Notwithſtanding his preferments, yet, whether it was owing to that neglect and contempt of the things of this world, which are common among ſtudious perſons, or to any other cauſe, certain it is, that Dr. Cudworth's income was not ſufficient to maintain him; and therefore he left, upon that account, the Univerſity for a while: but, being extremely beloved, he was ſoon invited thither again. For, upon the death of Dr. Samuel Bolton, Maſter of Chriſt's College, in October 1654, he was choſen to ſucceed him. The ſame year he married; and ſpent in this place the remainder of his days, being very careful of young Gentlemens education. January 16, $165\frac{6}{7}$, he was one of the Divines appointed by the Grand Committee for Religion (f), to conſider of the tranſlations and impreſſions of the Bible [E]. The firſt of December, 1662, he was preſented by Gilbert Biſhop of London, to the Vicarage of Aſhwell, in the county of Hertford (g). And in 1678, he was inſtalled Prebendary of Glouceſter (h). But the moſt remarkable circumſtance of his life, and what does him moſt honour, is, that he was the Author of The True intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe; a book full of excellent reaſoning, and a great variety of curious learning [F]. As one extreme is generally apt to produce another, the pious Nonſenſe, and

In the Dedication of it to the Houſe of Commons, he told them, That the ſcope of that Sermon was not to contend for this or that opinion, but only to perſuade men to the Life of Chriſt, as the pith and kernel of all religion; without which all the ſeveral forms of religion in the world, though we pleaſe ourſelves never ſo much with them, are but ſo many ſeveral dreams.

[E] He was one of the Divines appointed, &c.] Theſe Divines, of which the chief, beſides Dr. Cudworth, were, Dr. Walton, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Caſtle, and Mr. Poulk, often met at the Lord Commiſſioner Whitelock's, and had the moſt learned men in the oriental tongues to conſult with in this great buſineſs, and divers excellent and learned obſervations of ſome miſtakes in the tranſlations of the Bible in Engliſh; which yet was agreed to be the beſt of any tranſlation in the world. But this deſign became fruitleſs by the Parliament's diſſolution (4).

By R. Cudworth, D. D.* Being ſurprized at the length of the firſt part, he publiſhed it, as a thing compleat of itſelf; deſigning to compoſe and publiſh afterwards a ſecond and third part, which, however, he never did (5). An abridgment of this book was publiſhed in 1706, under the following title, A Confutation of the Reaſon and Philoſophy of Atheiſm: being in a great meaſure either an Abridgment or an Improvement of what Dr. Cudworth offered to that purpoſe in his True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe. *Together with an Introduction, in which among accounts of other matters relating to this Treatiſe, there is an impartial examination of what that learned perſon advanced touching the Chriſtian Doctrine of a Trinity in Unity, and the Reſurrection of the Body In two Volumes. and ſtupid Enthuſiaſm, that had prevailed in this kingdom during the times of confuſion, were ſucceeded, in the licentious reign of King Charles II. and even ſome time before, by Atheiſm, Profaneneſs, and Irreligion. Many of our beſt Divines endeavoured to ſtop their progreſs, but none with more vigour or greater ſucceſs than Dr. Cudworth. 'None 'better knew how to uſe the arms of Reaſon and Learning, as one expreſſes it (i), to 'conquer the preſumptuous ignorance of Hobbes, who had acquired a great reputation at 'court.' 'Tis no wonder therefore that King Charles's courtiers ſhould undervalue the True intellectual Syſtem (k): but, notwithſtanding their vain efforts, it has and will maintain its reputation. The Author was undoubtedly ſeveral years about it, though it was not publiſhed till 1678 [G]. Beſides the four books already mentioned, Dr. Cudworth publiſhed in 1664, a Sermon preached at Lincoln's-Inn, on 1 Cor. xv. 57. and a treatiſe intituled Deus Juſtificatus, or, The Divine Goodneſs vindicated and cleared, againſt the Aſſertors of abſolute and inconditionate Reprobation. He left ſeveral books in manuſcript [H], of which only one has been printed ſince his deceaſe, intituled, A Treatiſe concerning eternal and immutable Morality [I]. He died at Cambridge June 26, 1688, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age, and was buried in Chriſt's College. Several ſons that he had died young; but one daughter, named Damaris [K], born January 18, 1658, ſurvived him. She was ſecond wife to Sir Francis Maſham, of Oates in Eſſex, Baronet, and had by him a ſon, Francis Cudworth Maſham, Eſq (l); one of the Maſters in Chancery, Accomptant-General of the ſaid court, and foreign Appoſer in the Court of Exchequer, who died May 17, 1731. Dr. Cudworth was a man of great piety and moderation, of uncommon prudence; and eſpecially of very extenſive learning: for he was not only a good Linguiſt and Antiquary, but alſo an able Mathematician, a ſubtil Philoſopher, and a profound Metaphyſician. In his ſmall treatiſes, he ſhows himſelf well ſkilled in the oriental languages; as he appears in his Intellectual Syſtem a perfect maſter of the Platonic Philoſophy; with a great ſtrength of genius, and a vaſt compaſs of learning. He hath in it ſome particular notions; namely, of a Plaſtic Nature, which, ſubordinate to the Supreme Being, forms and organizes the bodies of animals, and produceth other phænomena (m): and, what he ſaith concerning the Trinity (n), and the Reſurrection (o), is thought not to be exactly conformable to the received opinions [L]. But, notwithſtanding, he muſt be impartially allowed allowed to have been 'a great man in all parts of learning, divine and human, an honour 'to Emanuel College where he was educated, to Chriſt's College where he afterwards 'preſided, chart, and Spencer (11). The doctrine advanced in it has ſo far ſtood its ground, as to have been ſupported, from time to time, by one divine or other, down to the preſent day. A work which adopts the ſame idea, was written above forty years ago, by Mr. Willets, a learned diſſenting miniſter, at Newcaſtle under Lyne. Biſhop Warburton, in the ſecond volume of his diſcourſes on the principles of natural and revealed religion, has elaborately ſuſtained Dr. Cudworth's opinion; and the preſent Biſhop of Cheſter (Dr. Cleaver) has very recently ſhewn himſelf to be an ingenious defender of the ſame ſentiment. On the other hand, Biſhop Hoadly, in his Plain Account, could diſcern no evidence of the Lord's Supper being a feaſt upon a ſacrifice. That it is a groundleſs notion, was ably maintained, in a pamphlet, publiſhed in 1755, in anſwer to Warburton: and Cudworth's hypotheſis has lately been refuted by Dr. Bell. Indeed, the idea that the Sacrament is merely a commemoration of the death of Chriſt, and calculated, in that view, to anſwer important moral purpoſes, is ſo rational and intelligible, and, at the ſame time, ſo conformable to the direct words of the inſtitution, that there appears to be no neceſſity or foundation for having recourſe to any ſcheme of a more recondite and myſterious nature.

The dedication to the ſermon which Dr. Cudworth preached before the Houſe of Commons, in 1647, is omitted in the impreſſion of it that was given at the end of the "Intellectual Syſtem," in 1678. This is the more to be regretted, as it diſplays the Doctor's ſentiments, upon the nature of religion, and the value of learning, at a time of prevailing fanaticiſm and bigotry, in a manner which reflects no ſmall credit on the liberality of his mind. We ſhall inſert, therefore, an account of it, for which we are indebted to the great "General Dictionary."

"He obſerves there, that the ſcope of this Sermon was not to contend for this or that opinion, but only to perſuade men to the Life of Chriſt, as the pith and kernel of all Religion; without which all the ſeveral Forms of Religion in the world, though we pleaſe ourſelves never ſo much in them, are but ſo many ſeveral dreams. And thoſe many opinions about Religion, that are every where ſo eagerly contended for on all ſides, where this doth not lie at the bottom, are but ſo many ſhadows fighting with one another. So that I may well ſay of the true Chriſtian, that is indeed poſſeſſed of the life of Chriſtianity, in oppoſition to all thoſe that are but lightly tinctured with the opinions of it, in the language of the Poet,

Οἷσιν πέπνυται τοὶ δ' ὡς σκιαὶ αἴσσουσι.

Wherefore I could not think any thing elſe either more neceſſary for Chriſtians in generall, or ſeaſonable at this time, than to ſtirre them up to the reall eſtabliſhment of the Righteouſneſſe of God in their hearts, and that Participation of the divine Nature, which the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of; that ſo they might not content themſelves with mere phancies and conceits of Chriſt, without the Spirit of Chriſt really dwelling in them, and Chriſt himſelf inwardly formed in their hearts, nor ſatisfie themſelves with the mere holding of right and orthodox opinions, as they conceive, whileſt they are utterly devoid within of that Divine Life, which Chriſt came to kindle in men's ſouls, and therefore are ſo apt to ſpend all their zeal upon a violent obtruding of their own opinions and apprehenſions upon others, which cannot give entertainment to them. "Which, beſides its repugnancy to "the doctrine and example of Chriſt himſelf, is like "to be the bellows, that will blow a perpetual fire "of diſcord and contention in the Chriſtian Common-"wealths; whileſt in the mean time thoſe hungry "and ſtarved opinions devoure all the life and ſub-"ſtance of Religion, as the lean Kine in Pharaoh's "Dream did eat up the fat. Nor laſtly, pleaſe "themſelves onely in the violent oppoſing of other "men's Superſtitions, according to the genius of the "preſent times, without ſubſtituting in the room of "them an inward Principle of Spirit and Life in their "own ſouls. For I fear many of us that pull down "idols in churches, may ſet them up in our hearts; "and whilſt we quarrel with painted glaſſe, make no "ſcruple at all of entertaining many foul luſts in "our ſouls, and committing continual idolatry with "them." He afterwards deſires the Houſe of Commons, that after their care for the advancement of Religion and the public good of the Commonwealth, they would think it worthy of them to promote ingenuous learning, and caſt a favourable influence upon it. I mean not, ſays he, that onely, which furniſheth the pulpit, which you ſeem to be very regardfull of; but that, which is remote from ſuch popular uſe, in the ſeveral kinds of it, which yet are all of them both very ſubſervient to Religion, and uſefull to the Commonwealth. There is indeed a Ψευδοπαιδεία, as the Philoſopher tells us, a baſtardly kind of Literature, and a Ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, as the Apoſtle inſtructeth us, a Knowledge falſely ſo called, which deſerves not to be pleaded for. But the noble and generous improvement of our underſtanding faculty in the true contemplation of the Wiſdome, Goodneſſe, and other Attributes of God, in that great fabrick of the univerſe, cannot eaſily be diſparaged without a blemiſh caſt upon the Maker of it. Doubtleſſe we may as well enjoy that which God hath communicated of himſelf to the creatures by this larger faculty of our underſtandings, as by thoſe narrow and low faculties of our ſenſes; and yet no body counts it to be unlawfull to hear a leſſon plaied upon the lute, or to ſmell a roſe. And theſe raiſed improvements of our natural underſtandings may be as well ſubſervient and ſubordinate to a divine Light in our minds, as the natural uſe of thoſe outward creatures here below to the life of God in our hearts. Nay all true knowledge doth of itſelf naturally tend to God, who is the Fountain of it; and would ever be raiſing of our ſouls up upon its wings thither, did not we κατέχειν ἐν ἀδικίᾳ, detain it, and hold it down in unrighteouſneſſe, as the Apoſtle ſpeaketh. "All "Philoſophy to a wiſe man, to a truly ſanctified mind, "as he in Plutarch ſpeaketh, is but ὕλη τῆς Θεολογίας, "matter for Divinity to work upon. Religion is the "Queen of all thoſe inward endowments of the ſoul, "and all pure naturall knowledge, all virgin and "undeflowred arts and ſciences are her handmaids, "that riſe up and call her bleſſed. I need not tell "you how much the ſkill of tongues and languages, "beſides the excellent uſe of all Philology in gene-"rall, conduceth to the right underſtanding of the "letter of ſacred Writings, on which the ſpirituall "notions muſt be built; for can thoſe poſſibly be "ignorant of that, which have but once heard of a "Tranſlation of the Bible? The Apoſtle exhorteth "private Chriſtians to whatſoever things are lovely, "whatſoever things are of good report, if there be any "virtue, if there be any praiſe, to think on thoſe things; "and therefore it may well become you, (noble Gen-"tlemen) in your publick ſphere, to encourage ſo "noble a thing as knowledge is, which will reflect "ſo much luſtre and honour back again upon your "ſelves (12)."

The Intellectual Syſtem is a work of ſuch immenſe learning, and ſuch great celebrity, that a fuller view of its deſign than our Predeceſſor has given cannot but be deſirable.

"In the preface Dr. Cudworth tells us, that when he engaged the preſs, he intended only a diſcourſe concerning Liberty and Neceſſity, or, to ſpeak out more plainly, againſt the fatal Neceſſity of all actions and events; which, upon whatever grounds maintained, will ſerve the deſign of Atheiſm, and undermine Chriſtianity and all Religion, as taking away all guilt and blame, puniſhments and rewards. But afterwards he conſidered, that this, which is indeed a controverſy concerning the True and Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe, does in the full extent of it take in other things; the Neceſſity of all actions and events being maintained by ſeveral perſons upon very different grounds, according to the tripartite Fataliſm mentioned in the beginning of the firſt chapter; the ' preſided, to the whole Univerſity of Cambridge which he adorned (p), and to the Church ' and Age in which he lived (q).'

the firſt of which, ſuppoſing the material Neceſſity of all things without a God, he tells us, is abſolute Atheiſm; the ſecond, Immoral Theiſm, or Religion without any Natural Juſtice and Morality, all juſt and unjuſt, according to this hypotheſis, being factitious, made by arbitrary will and command only; and the third, ſuch a Theiſm as acknowledges not only a God or omnipotent underſtanding Being, but alſo Natural Juſtice and Morality, founded in him, and derived from him; nevertheleſs no Liberty from Neceſſity any where, and therefore no diſtributive or retributive Juſtice in the world. " Whereas theſe three things " are the fundamentals or eſſentials of true Religion. " Firſt, that all things in the world do not float " without a Head or Governor; but that there is a " God, an omnipotent underſtanding Being, preſid- " ing over all. Secondly, that this God being " eſſentially good and juſt, there is φύσει καλὸν " καὶ δικαιον, ſomething in its own nature immutably " and eternally juſt and unjuſt, and not by arbitrary " will, law, and command only. And laſtly, that " there is ſomething ἐφ' ἡμῖν, or, that we are ſo far " forth the principles or maſters of our own actions, " as to be accountable to juſtice for them, or to " make us guilty and blame-worthy for what we do " amiſs, and to deſerve puniſhment accordingly." Theſe three things, as the Doctor obſerves, taken all together, make up the wholeneſs and entireneſs of that, which he calls, The True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe, in ſuch a ſenſe as Atheiſm may be called a falſe Syſtem thereof; the word Intellectual being added to diſtinguiſh it from the other, vulgarly ſo called, Syſtems of the World (that is, the viſible and corporeal World) the Ptolomaic, Tychonic, and Copernican; the two former of which are now commonly accounted falſe, the latter true. And thus our Author's proſpect being now enlarged into a threefold Fataliſm, or ſpurious and falſe Hypotheſis of the Intellectual Syſtem, making all things neceſſary upon ſeveral grounds, he accordingly deſigned the confutation of them all in three ſeveral Books. The firſt againſt Atheiſm, (which is the Democritic fate) wherein all the Reaſon and Philoſophy thereof is refelled, and the Exiſtence of a God demonſtrated, and ſo that ὑλικὴ ἀνάγκη, or material Neceſſity of all things, is overthrown. The ſecond, for ſuch a God as is not mere arbitrary Will omnipotent, decreeing, doing, and neceſſitating all actions, bad as well as good; but eſſentially moral, good, and juſt; and for a natural Diſcrimen honeſtorum & turpium, whereby another ground of the Neceſſity of all human actions will be removed. And the third and laſt, againſt Neceſſity intrinſecal and eſſential to all actions, and for ſuch a Liberty and Sui-Poteſtas in rational creatures, as may render them accountable, capable of rewards and puniſhments, and ſo objects of diſtributive or retributive Juſtice, by which the now only remaining ground of the fatal Neceſſity of all actions and events will be taken away. And all theſe three under that one general title of the True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe; each book having beſides, its own particular title. But the firſt of theſe books only appeared under the title abovementioned; our Author informing the reader in his preface, that tho' the other two books were and ſtill are really intended by us, yet the compleat finiſhing and publication of them will notwithſtanding depend upon many contingencies, not only of our life and health, the latter of which, as well as the former, is to us very uncertain; but alſo of our leiſure or vacancy from other neceſſary employments. At the cloſe of the preface he obſerves, that tho' ſome may think his work ſuperfluous, upon pretence, that an Atheiſt is a chimera, no where to be found in the world, yet ſuch perſons are both unſkilled in the monuments of antiquity, and unacquainted with the preſent age they live in, others having found too great an aſſurance from their own perſonal converſe of the reality of them. " Nevertheleſs, continues he, this " labour of ours is not intended only for the con- " verſion of downright and profeſſed Atheiſts (of " which there is but little hope, they being ſunk " into ſo great a degree of ſottiſhneſs,) but for the " confirmation of weak, ſtaggering, and ſceptical " Theiſts. And unleſs thoſe exploders of Atheiſts " will affirm alſo, that all men have conſtantly an " unſhaken faith and belief of the Exiſtence of God " without the leaſt mixture of doubtful diſtruſt or " heſitancy, (which if it were ſo, the world could " not poſſibly be ſo bad as now it is,) they muſt " needs grant, ſuch endeavours as theſe for the con- " firming and eſtabliſhing of men's minds in the be- " lief of a God by philoſophic reaſons, in an age ſo " philoſophical, not to be ſuperfluous and uſeleſs " (13)."

(13) Ibid. p. 485, 486, note F.

We ſhall add a farther account of Mr. Wiſe's Abridgment of the Intellectual Syſtem.

" Mr. Wiſe in his introduction remarks, that Dr. Cudworth's book, which is the vaſteſt magazine of reaſoning and learning, that ever ſingly appeared againſt Atheiſm, is ſwelled with frequent repetitions, circumlocutions, and digreſſions, and the ſeries and thread of it much interrupted by Greek and Latin quotations, ſo that hardly any writing will better admit of an abridgment; upon which account Mr. Wiſe undertook his work. He then proceeds to obſerve, that Dr. Cudworth, having laid down a general propoſition, that the Heathens univerſally held but one unmade independent God, comes to ſhew that the Platoniſts in particular maintained an unity of the Godhead in their three divine Hypoſtaſes, viz. Monad or Good, Mind, and Soul; notwithſtanding that they owned theſe three Hypoſtaſes to be numerically diſtinct, or to have diſtinct ſingular Eſſences of their own. To vindicate the Platoniſts in this point, he tells us, that the ancient orthodox Fathers of the Chriſtian Church were generally of no other perſuaſion than this, that that Eſſence or Subſtance of the Godhead, which all the three Perſons or Hypoſtaſes agree in, as each of them is God, was not ſingular or individual, but only one common or univerſal Eſſence or Subſtance. This and other aſſertions of the like nature in Dr. Cudworth's Intellectual Syſtem, have made ſo much noiſe in the world, that there was ſcarcely a pamphlet or book written for many years concerning the Trinity, eſpecially in England, and in the heterodox way, which did not bring in the Doctor's authority; while on the other hand the orthodox treat his notion with the utmoſt ſeverity. Mr. Wiſe therefore endeavours, as much as poſſible, to clear up and juſtify our Author's doctrine. He afterwards proceeds to conſider Dr. Cudworth's opinion about the Reſurrection, who, as appears from ſeveral paſſages of his Intellectual Syſtem thought, that the Reſurrection-Body will not conſiſt of the ſame ſubſtance with that which was buried; and that it will not be a body of fleſh, but an ætherial one; and that the preſent body is only a ſeed of the Reſurrection. However Mr. Wiſe ſhews from ſome other paſſages in his works, that he has as plainly aſſerted the Reſurrection of the ſame numerical Body, as in ſome places he denied it (14)."

(14) Ibid.

It is not eaſy to meet with a greater ſtore-houſe of ancient literature than the " Intellectual Syſtem;" and various writers, we believe, have been indebted to it for an appearance of learning which they might not otherwiſe have been able to maintain. That Dr. Cudworth was fanciful in ſome of his opinions, and that he was too devoted a follower of Plato and the Platoniſts, will ſcarcely be denied even by thoſe who are moſt ſenſible of his general merit. What he hath ſaid concerning the Platonic Trinity has lately been remarked upon in the Theological Repoſitory (15).

(15) Theological Repoſitory, vol. iv. p. 95—97.

The reflections that have been caſt upon ſuch a man as our Author, by Mr. Turner, (mentioned in note [L]), and by other bigoted writers, are altogether contemptible. It is the lot of diſtinguiſhed merit to be thus treated. Lord Shafteſbury, ſpeaking on this ſubject, has given an honourable teſtimony to the memory of Dr. Cudworth. " You know," ſays his Lordſhip, " the common fate of thoſe who dare to ap- " pear fair authors. What was that pious and " learned man's caſe, who wrote the Intellectual " Syſtem of the Univerſe? I confeſs it was pleaſant " enough to conſider, that though the whole " world were no leſs ſatisfied with his capacity and " learning, than with his ſincerity in the cauſe of " Deity; yet he was accuſed of giving the upper " hand to the Atheiſt, for having only ſtated their " reaſons, and thoſe of their adverſaries, fairly toge- " ther (16)."

(16) Characteriſtics, vol. ii. p. 262.

It is obſerved by Dr. Birch, that Dr. Cudworth's Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe has raiſed him a reputation, to which nothing can add, but the publication of his other writings ſtill extant in manuſcript (17). That theſe writings are very valuable, cannot be doubted. We may be aſſured that they diſplay a great compaſs of ſentiment, and a great extent of learning. Nevertheleſs, from their voluminous quantity, from the abſtruſeneſs of the ſubjects they treat upon, and from the revolutions of literary taſte and opinion, it is morally certain, that the publication of them would not be ſucceſsful in the preſent age. The hiſtory of the fate of Dr. Cudworth's Poſthumous Works is ſomewhat curious. Having been left to the care of his daughter, Lady Maſham, they for a long time quietly repoſed in the library at Oates, in Eſſex. But, about the year 1762, when the late Lord Maſham married his ſecond Lady, his Lordſhip thought proper to remove a number of volumes of ancient learning, which had been bequeathed to the family by Mr. Locke, and the manuſcripts of Dr. Cudworth, to make room for books of polite amuſement. For this purpoſe, he ſold either the whole, or a conſiderable part of them, to Mr. Robert Davis, then a Bookſeller in Piccadilly. Mr. Davis being told, or having concluded, that the manuſcripts were the productions of Mr. Locke, it became an object of conſideration with him, how to convert them, as a tradeſman, to the beſt advantage. They contained, among other things, ſundry notes on ſcripture. About the ſame time, a number of manuſcript ſcriptural notes by Dr. Waterland came into the poſſeſſion of the Bookſellers. The buſineſs, therefore, was, by the aid of ſuch celebrated names as Mr. Locke and Dr. Waterland, to fabricate a new Bible with Annotations. At a conſultation, however, it was ſuggeſted, that, though theſe names were very important, it would be neceſſary, to the complete ſucceſs of the deſign, to join with them ſome popular living character. Dr. Dodd was then in the height of his reputation as a preacher; and, accordingly, he was fixed upon to carry on the undertaking. This was the origin of Dr. Dodd's Bible. Part of the materials put into his hands the Doctor made uſe of in the Chriſtian Magazine. When the manuſcripts were returned to Mr. Davis, he carried them down to Barnes in Surry, which was his country retirement, and threw them into a garret, where they lay expoſed to the dangers of ſuch a ſituation. About the beginning of the year 1777, a Gentleman, who had a veneration for the name of Mr. Locke, and was concerned to hear that any of his writings were in danger of being loſt, went to Barnes, to ſee theſe manuſcripts; and being poſitively aſſured, by Mr. Davis, that they were the real compoſitions of that eminent man, he immediately purchaſed them for forty guineas. He was, however, ſoon convinced, after an examination of them, that the authority of the bookſeller was fallacious. This being the caſe, he remonſtrated againſt the deception; and the vender condeſcended to take them again, upon being paid ten guineas for his diſappointment in the negociation. In the inveſtigation of the manuſcripts, the Gentleman having diſcovered, by many inconteſtable proofs, that they were the writings of Dr. Cudworth, he recommended them to the Curators of the Britiſh Muſeum, by whom they were purchaſed; and thus, at laſt, after many perils and mutilations, they are ſafely lodged in that noble repoſitory (18).

(17) Life of Tillotſon, p. 54.

Mr. Granger obſerves, that Dr. Ralph Cudworth held the ſame rank in Metaphyſics that Dr. Barrow did in the Sublime Geometry; and his daughter he calls the learned and accompliſhed Lady Maſham. Juſtly does her memory deſerve to be held in honour, both for her own attainments and her unſhaken friendſhip to Mr. Locke. Of her Treatiſe concerning the Love of God, which was publiſhed at London, in 1696, in 12*mo.* without her name, we ſhall ſubjoin ſome account, from the General Dictionary.

" She begins with obſerving, that whatever re- " proaches have been made by the Romaniſts, on the " one hand, of the want of books of devotion in the " Church of England; or by the Diſſenters on the " other, of a dead and lifeleſs way of preaching; it " may be affirmed, that there cannot any where be " found ſo good a collection of diſcourſes upon " Moral Subjects, as might be made of Engliſh Ser- " mons and other Treatiſes of that nature written by " the Divines of our Church; which books are cer- " tainly in themſelves of the greateſt and moſt gene- " ral uſe of any, and do moſt conduce to that, which " is the chief aim of Chriſtianity, a good life." She then animadverts upon thoſe, who undervalue Morality, and others, who ſtrain the duties of it to an impracticable pitch, and pretend to aſcend by it to ſomething beyond or above it; and afterwards proceeds to conſider the conduct of thoſe, who build their practical and devotional Diſcourſes upon principles, which not only will not bear the teſt, but which oblige them to lay down ſuch aſſertions of Morality, as ſober and well diſpoſed Chriſtians cannot underſtand to be practicable. And here ſhe applies herſelf to the examination of Mr. John Norris's ſcheme in his Practical Diſcourſes and other Treatiſes, wherein he maintains, that " mankind are obliged ſtrictly, as their " duty, to love with deſire nothing but God only, " every degree of deſire of any creature whatſoever, " being ſinful." Which aſſertion Mr. Norris defends upon this ground, that God, not the Creature, is the immediate efficient cauſe of our ſenſations; for whatſoever gives us pleaſure has a right to our love; but God only gives us pleaſure; therefore he only has a right to our love. This hypotheſis is conſidered with great accuracy and ingenuity by Lady Maſham, and the bad conſequences of it repreſented in a ſtrong light. This Diſcourſe was tranſlated into French by Mr. Coſte in 1705 (19)."] K.

CUFF or CUFFE (Henry), a celebrated wit, a famous ſcholar, and the unfortunate Secretary of the unhappy Earl of Eſſex, who ſuffered towards the cloſe of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He is by ſome ſaid, or rather ſuggeſted, to have been but of low birth (a); but very unjuſtly, ſince there is good evidence to prove, that his anceſtors had been reputed Gentlemen for ſeveral deſcents, and had lands to a conſiderable value about Creech and Taunton in Somerſetſhire (b). He was born at Hinton St. George in that county, about the year 1560 (c), was educated at a Grammar-ſchool, and gave very early marks both of genius and application (d); inſomuch that, in 1576, he was removed to Oxford, and entered there of Trinity College (e). His parts were ſo quick, and his diligence ſo great, that he very ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf from moſt of his contemporaries, more eſpecially in his knowledge of Greek, and his admirable faculty in diſputing. He became, in due time, Fellow of his College, and would, without doubt, have gone through his academical ſtudies with all the ſucceſs and applauſe imaginable, if it had not been for a certain haſtineſs of temper, which induced him to ſpeak his mind very freely on ſubjects and of perſons, with whom he had little or nothing to do. A ſaying of his of Sir Thomas Pope, who was the Founder of the College in which he was educated, proved fatal to him, ſo that he was turned out of his Fellowſhip, and expelled the College (f). His merit merit, however, was so great, and his reputation for learning so extraordinary, that he was received into Merton-College by Sir Henry Savile, then Warden of it, and who was particularly remarkable for being a most disinterested patron of such as were truly scholars (g). In 1586 Mr. Cuff was elected Probationer-fellow of that College, and, being very intimate with many of the greatest men of those times who were bred at this University, he was looked upon as one capable of making a shining figure in the world (h); more especially as he was known to turn his thoughts to active life, and to apply himself with great vigour to the more polite as well as abstruser parts of learning. In 1588 he became Fellow of Merton-College, and, on the 20th of February following, he took the degree of Master of Arts (i). Amongst other persons of note with whom he had great intimacy, one was the learned Mr. Camden, in commendation of whose excellent Britannia he wrote a Greek epigram, that has been much admired (k). This indeed was the happiest part of his life, and it had been very fortunate for him if he had contented himself with that easy and honourable situation, which his own learning, and the assistance of his friends in this University, had procured him, notwithstanding the slip he had made in the earlier part of his life, from a vivacity of temper which never left him [A]. He was afterwards promoted to the Greek Professorship, and was chosen Proctor of the University April 10th, 1594 (l). At what time he left the University, or upon what occasion, does not appear; but there is great reason to believe, that it was for the sake of improving himself by travelling into foreign parts (m); for he was always inclined rather to a busy than a retired life, and held, that learning was of little service to any man, if it did not render him fitter for being employed in matters of importance. This disposition of his recommended him very much to the favour of Robert Earl of Essex, who was himself much of the same temper; that is, equally fond of knowledge and business, and strongly perswaded the former was of very little use but as it fitted men for the latter. His Lordship writing admirably well, and being an excellent judge of the writings of other men, thought it would be highly useful to himself, and the means of promoting Mr. Cuffe, if he took him into his service, as well as into his protection; and accordingly, about the time that he became Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (n), Mr. Cuffe was appointed his Secretary. It appears, from the private as well as public histories of those times, that he was very much in his confidence; but, whether the Earl intrusted him with the dark designs he carried on with Tyrone, in order to make himself King of England, and Tyrone Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is as little certain, as whether his Lordship ever had any such designs, or was so unfortunate only as to have them imputed to him by his enemies (o). This, however, is out of dispute, that, when the Earl returned from his expedition, in August 1599, to Dublin, and resolved to send over an account to the Queen of what he had concluded with Tyrone, he made choice of Mr. Cuffe to be the bearer, and, perhaps, used his assistance in penning those letters. This was certainly both a dangerous and a disagreeable service; which, however, Mr. Cuffe undertook, and very happily performed, delivering his letters safely to her Majesty; and afterwards, upon some insinuations to his prejudice, upon which he was sent for to the Queen, he justified himself to her satisfaction (p) [B]. As he had naturally a very high spirit, was sincerely attached

[A] From a vivacity of temper which never left him.] It was certainly a mark of the candour, as well as care, of Mr. Wood, that he took so much pains as to search the Heralds Office, in order to find the grant of a coat of arms made to Job Cuffe, our author's ancestor, by Christopher Baker then King at Arms, in the 36th of Henry VIII (1). He was in the wrong however to fix upon a late, and in some respects a low, writer, as author of those detracting passages, that passed so currently in the world to his prejudice; whereas, most undoubtedly, these took rise from what was said of him by a noble author (2), who wrote indeed at that time under direction, and we may believe could not but be rude to his Secretary, after being roundly schooled by the Queen, for speaking with common decency of his master. It was from him therefore that succeeding writers copied, though there wanted not others, well acquainted with those times and with the man, who spoke of him with decency, pity, and even with respect. He was but a very young man when he went to Oxford, and it was by the pregnancy of his parts that he became so early a Fellow of Trinity College. Mr. Wood tells us, in one place, that he was forced to resign his Fellowship for saying somewhat that was true of the Founder (3). In another place, however, that is, in a Collection of Historical Passages, he has set down the whole story, and that upon good authority; which as it very fully justifies what we have said in the text, the reader shall have in his own words (4): 'Dr. Bathurst told 'me, that our Cuffe was of Trinity College, and expelled from thence upon this account: the Founder, Sir Thomas Pope, would, whersoever he went 'a visiting his friend, steal one thing or other that 'he could lay his hands on, put it in his pocket, or 'under his gown. This was supposed rather an humour than of dishonesty. Now Cuffe upon a time, 'with his fellows being merry, said, a pox this is a 'poor beggarly College indeed, the plate that our 'Founder stole would build such another. Which 'coming to the President's ears, was thereupon 'ejected, though afterwards elected into Merton 'College.' How dear he was to Sir Henry Savile, at that time Warden of Merton College, appears not only from his procuring him to be elected upon the very first occasion that offered after his own preferment, but also from a letter of his to the learned Camden, in which, in a very few words, he gives him the highest character, and stiles him his own and Camden's intimate friend.

[B] He justified himself to her satisfaction.] What we have to explain in this part of the work is, the share that Mr. Cuffe had in the Earl of Essex's proceedings; nor would this be of so much importance, if many of our Histories did not deliver things somewhat remote from truth in several instances, and directly contrary to it in others. It is generally set forth and believed, that the Earl went to Ireland with great joy and alacrity; whence it has been inferred, that he had dangerous designs in his head before he went attached to the Earl of Eſſex, and looked upon the uſage he met with from the court as effects rather of the power of the oppoſite faction, than the juſt puniſhment of the Earl's offences, he gave way to his reſentments, and was one of thoſe that diſſuaded that unhappy Lord, after his emerging a little from that dark cloud of the Queen's diſpleaſure, in which he had been involved, and ſuffered thereby ſeverely, from proſecuting the recovery of her favour by thoſe methods of humble duty, and deep ſubmiſſion, which others of his Lordſhip's friends adviſed (q). It is very poſſible, that both he and they might be prompted to the oppoſite counſels they gave, from certain views to their own intereſt, as well as thoſe of the Earl; for Mr. Anthony Bacon, and Sir Francis his brother, had other friends at Court, and other means to truſt to, than the countenance of the Earl of Eſſex, and might therefore adviſe him to what they thought beſt ſuited their own ſchemes. But it was quite otherwiſe with Mr. Cuffe: his ſole dependance was upon the Earl, and, as he had no other hopes of attaining any conſiderable office than by his favour and protection, he was very deſirous of ſeeing him quickly reſtored to the Queen's good graces, which he thought could not fail if he had once free acceſs to the Court, which, therefore, he prompted him to obtain by any means, and at any rate (r) [C]. While the Earl of Eſſex followed the advice of the two Bacons, as well as during his Lordſhip's confinement after his precipitate return from Ireland, Mr. Cuffe had little or no acceſs to him; but, after he recovered his liberty, and found that was not attended, as he expected, with a reſtitution of his power and credit, he began to recur to his old projects, and to converſe once more with his old friends, by which means Mr. Cuffe was recalled again to his ſervice, and to that meaſure of intimacy and confidence in which he had been formerly held (s). This, together with the great likeneſs of their tempers, was the ſource of both their misfortunes; for the Earl thenceforward began to diſlike, and even to ſuſpect, the repreſentations made to him by thoſe who were deſirous that he ſhould leave it to time, went thither, which he meant to ripen and bring to perfection there (5). However, the contrary of this is very fully proved (6), by a knowing and intelligent writer, who has brought to light many remarkable paſſages relating to theſe times. The truth ſeems to be, that the Earl of Eſſex found himſelf not able to perform any great matters in that kingdom, and was at the ſame time kept there by the Queen's expreſs command. It is very likely that it was this that put him upon his treaty with Tyrone, and afterwards induced him to form that deſperate deſign, of landing with two thouſand men at Milford Haven, from which it was with ſome difficulty he was diſſuaded by the Earl of Southampton and Sir Chriſtopher Blount. It is not at all probable that Mr. Cuffe was ſo much as acquainted with, much leſs in any degree the author of, this ſcheme; for he was ſent over in Auguſt with the Earl's letter to the Queen (7), a particular that ſeems to have been unknown to moſt of the writers upon this ſubject. But however he had not been long in London, before the zeal and diligence he expreſſed in his maſter's ſervice drew upon him the reſentment of ſome great perſons, who gave bad impreſſions of him to the Queen, which occaſioned his being ſent for. This paſſage we learn from a letter written at that very time by Mr. Rowland White to Sir Robert Sidney, dated September 12, 1599, which runs thus (8): 'The unkindneſs between my Lord of 'Eſſex and Mr. Secretary is grown to extremity. I 'hear my Lord is infinitely diſcontented, and in his 'diſcontentment uſes ſpeeches that may be dangerous 'and hurtful to his ſafety. Mr. Cuffe hath had ac'ceſs to the Queen, who came of purpoſe marvellouſly 'well inſtructed to anſwer ſuch objections as her Ma'jeſty could lay to his charge, and I hear that Cuffe 'hath very wiſely behaved himſelf to her Majeſty's 'better ſatisfaction.'

[C] By any means, and at any rate.] This was from firſt to laſt the great point which Mr. Cuffe had in view. He thought that the Earl of Eſſex's friends were ſo numerous, and ſome of them of ſuch high quality, that the method which the Cecilian party took to maintain themſelves in power, might be ſo repreſented as to raiſe a jealouſy in the Queen, who was very tender of her authority, and that if the Earl once came to her preſence, and repreſented theſe matters with his uſual eloquence, and was ſupported by the teſtimonies of thoſe who were prepared to make good his charge, their buſineſs would be done (9). But without doubt, when he firſt thought of this method, he had no deſign of accompliſhing it by force: that fell in afterwards, when experience had diſcovered that acceſs could be had no other way. It is true that ſomething of this nature had been propoſed to the Earl long before, when he was in Ireland: but he rejected it, and foreſeeing that it might be objected to him when his conduct was called in queſtion before the Privy Council, he ſet down an anſwer to this charge in the brief notes that he made for his defence, the ſubſtance of which is preſerved by a grave Hiſtorian (10). It is therefore moſt probable, that when force came again to be thought of, it was originally moved by the ſame perſon that firſt hinted it, and that was Sir Chriſtopher Blount, who had married the Earl of Eſſex's mother. This ſeems alſo to be clearly proved by the Earl of Eſſex's confeſſion, who charged that Gentleman with giving him ſuch advice (11). Upon the whole, therefore, we have good reaſon to believe, that at firſt theſe were two diſtinct deſigns, and that Mr. Cuffe founded all his hopes in the enlarging and increaſing the Earl's faction, by taking in malecontents of all parties and of all religions, but more eſpecially by drawing to him ſuch great men and Miniſters, as were known either to fear Secretary Cecil's reſentment, or to envy his greatneſs; in purſuance of which ſcheme Mr. Cuffe not only acted vigorouſly himſelf, and engaged the Earl in the like ſchemes, but prevailed upon him to employ others in the proſecution of that deſign, which went ſo far as to alarm the Court very much: nor is it at all improbable, that if it had been managed with more temper and diſcretion, and without giving ſuch viſible occaſions of queſtioning the Earl's dutiful intentions, it might have been brought to end otherwiſe than it did, the Earl having moſt part of the city, and not a few at Court, on his ſide. But it was that Nobleman's misfortune, that with very great parts he had very great weakneſſes. He was certainly a man of principle, as well in regard to policy as religion; but as he had very ſtrong paſſions, and thoſe kept conſtantly inflamed by his followers on one ſide, and his enemies on the other, there was little of ſteadineſs in his proceedings. He ſometimes embraced the ſentiments of Lord Henry Howard, afterwards Earl of Northampton, and of his Court friends; but this method proving ſlow, he came, as it is ſaid in the text, to diſlike that, and fall in with Cuffe's counſels, who ſuſpected the ſincerity of the Courtiers, and thought to make his Lord formidable, by placing him at the head of a numerous party. But this too not anſwering in ſo ſhort a time as his deſires, and indeed his occaſions, required, Sir Chriſtopher Blount's project was brought again upon the carpet, and thus, by only approving the beſt, and purſuing the worſt counſels, this Nobleman ruined himſelf and all who were attached to him.

(9) This is Cuffe's own account of the matter, at his trial, in his confeſſions, and at his death.

and the Queen's known regard for him, to overcome the ill impreſſions ſhe had received, and not, by a haſty reſuming of his former popularity, beget new grounds of diſtaſte, and afford his enemies freſh opportunities of inſinuating things to his prejudice, the only method which, as they perſuaded him, could hinder his coming once more into favour and power (t). Yet, as much as the Earl liked the zeal and affection of his Secretary, and notwithſtanding he delighted very much, as indeed he very well might, in his converſation, ſince he had a wonderful facility of applying all that he had learned from books to buſineſs, and of ſuiting the wiſe obſervations of ancient authors to the tranſactions of modern times (u); yet, his Lordſhip was but too well acquainted with the nature of Courts, and more eſpecially that he had to deal with, to regard Mr. Cuffe's political reflections as oracles, which the other obſerved, and took amiſs. This led him to ſhew the Earl, that he was not ſo far addicted to him as not to ſee his blind ſide; for that his ſubmiſſion, when called before the Lords of the Privy-Council, had ſunk his character very much without raiſing his fortune at all; that, by admitting his own conduct in Ireland to be wrong, he, in effect, acknowledged all the proceedings againſt him to be right; and therefore, if he meant not to lead a life of dependance, he muſt think of recovering his reputation by ſome diſtinguiſhed action (w). This rouzed the Earl, whoſe parts were certainly very good. He ſaw at once the danger of ſuch advice, and the deſtruction that muſt attend his following it; for which reaſon he not only rejected it with diſdain, but ordered Sir Gelly Merrick to diſcharge the Secretary immediately from his ſervice, which, if he had done, ſome writers ſeem to think both their lives had been by it preſerved. So it was however, that Sir Gelly Merrick took no notice of this order, which omiſſion coſt him his life alſo. The reaſon he gave for it was, that he was afraid Mr. Cuffe might be tempted to join with his Lord's enemies; but his real motive was, his agreeing in Cuffe's ſentiments (x). However, this produced a coldneſs, which laſted for ſome time. But the Queen denying to renew the Earl's grant for farming the ſweet wines, and ſome other mortifications which he received from Court having again ſoured his temper, he called Mr. Cuffe back to his Councils; to which he might be poſſibly induced for the ſake of managing better a new deſign he was upon, which was intereſting King James in his favour, or, rather, labouring to perſuade that Prince of his cordial affection to his ſervice: a thing not a little ſuſpected before, as appeared by the Jeſuit Parſons's dedicating to his Lordſhip his dangerous book about the Succeſſion, which he had publiſhed under the name of Doleman (y). This ſcheme was certainly a better one than the former, and there is ſome reaſon to believe that this alſo was Cuffe's, and was, for ſome time, pretty well managed. But ſuch was the heat of ſome of their aſſociates tempers, that they would not ſuffer the Earl to wait for the good effects that project might have produced. On the contrary, they were continually infuſing into him his danger of becoming a beggar, upon the expiration of his grant for the ſweet wines; in conſequence of which his friends would drop off, and he muſt entirely loſe that credit and influence which had hitherto made him dreadful to his enemies, even under the weight of his misfortunes (z). By degrees theſe inſinuations prevailed ſo far upon the Earl's mind, that he departed entirely from his ſcheme of ſubmiſſion, and returned to that ſort of conduct which he had purſued in Ireland, directing, or at leaſt allowing, Sir Gelly Merrick to keep a kind of open table for diſcontented and factious perſons of all parties, though he did not appear in perſon, or converſe with any of them, agreeably to one of Cuffe's maxims, That it was good to have a multitude at his back, but few heads in his council (a). Upon particular occaſions, and to afford them neceſſary inſtructions for the management of their reſpective parts in the maintenance of his aſſociation, the Earl of Eſſex conferred perſonally, but generally in private, with the principal Lords and Gentlemen of his party; yet without diſcloſing the whole extent of his views, or the means he intended to employ in order to carry them into execution: thoſe were reſerved for his ſecret council, and theſe, as far as we can diſcern, were Sir Chriſtopher Blount and Mr. Cuffe, who ſuggeſted and directed, or at leaſt examined, and gave their approbation, to all his proceedings (b) [D]. [D] Or at leaſt examined and directed, and gave their approbation to all his proceedings.] We have in the text, upon the authority of a grave and great Hiſtorian, given an account of the motives upon which the Earl of Eſſex diſmiſſed Mr. Cuffe (12), and how the meaſure came to prove abortive; but the tale is quite otherwiſe told by a very polite writer, and one who aſſerts he had it from good authority. His ſtory is worth the reading, it runs thus (13): 'There was 'amongſt the Earl of Eſſex's neareſt attendants, one 'Henry Cuffe, a man of ſecret ambitious ends of his 'own, and of proportionate counſels, ſmothered under 'the habit of a ſcholar, and ſlubbered over with a 'certain rude and clowniſh faſhion, that had the ſemblance of integrity. This perſon, not above five or 'ſix weeks before my Lord's fatal irruption into the 'city, was, by the Earl's ſpecial command, ſuddenly 'diſcharged from all further attendance or acceſs 'unto him, out of an inward diſpleaſure then taken 'againſt his ſharp and importunate infuſions, and out 'of a glimmering foreſight, that he would prove the 'very inſtrument of his ruin. I muſt add hereunto, 'that about the ſame time my Lord had received 'from the Counteſs of Warwick (a Lady powerful 'in the Court, and indeed a virtuous uſer of her 'power) the beſt advice that I think was ever given 'from either ſex, That when he was free from reſtraint 'he ſhould cloſely take any out-lodgings at Green-'which, and ſometimes, when the Queen went abroad 'in a good humour, whereof ſhe would give him 'notice, he ſhould come forth and humble himſelf 'before her in the field. This counſel ſunk much 'into foot at this time by Mr. Cuffe, for the ſupport of the Earl's intereſt, there was one which ſhewed him a true politician, a great maſter in the knowledge of human nature, and a man equally capable of contriving with the utmoſt ſagacity, and executing with the greateſt addreſs. Sir Henry Nevile, who had been the Queen's Ambaſſador in France, and who had ſhewn himſelf, in a long and troubleſome negotiation, as active and able a Stateſman as thoſe times had produced, was then at home, and under a kind of a court cloud, which, though he was nearly related to Sir Robert Cecil, he had ſome cauſe to ſuſpect was of his raiſing; or, at leaſt, he thought he had good grounds to be diſpleaſed, that, by his known power and intereſt, it was not diſpelled (c). Upon the diſcontents of this great and wiſe Miniſter, Mr. Cuffe thought it practicable to work; and, though he had never any nearneſs with the Earl of Eſſex in his greateſt proſperity, or the leaſt correſpondence with him ſince his troubles began, yet Mr. Cuffe, who knew with how great efficacy the aſſociating ſo great a perſon, and of ſuch high reputation for his ſagacity in their deſigns, would operate in favour of the Earl's cauſe, undertook to bring it about, and, againſt all ſhew of probability, ſucceeded (d). He took an opportunity of inſinuating to Sir Henry, that, after the Queen, his miſtreſs, the nation in general, and the Miniſtry in particular, had received many and great advantages from that vigilance and induſtry with which he had managed public affairs in France, and elſewhere; inſtead of receiving ſuitable rewards, exceptions were taken to his conduct, and himſelf put under difficulties and hardſhips, by the intrigues of Cecil, who was jealous of every man whoſe ſervices were greater, and whoſe parts were better, than his own. By theſe ſuggeſtions he wrought himſelf ſo thoroughly into the confidence of Sir Henry Nevile, that he brought him to have a good opinion of the Earl his maſter's intentions for the public ſervice; and this may be juſtly eſteemed the moſt eminent ſtroke of Cuffe's politicks, and the higheſt proof of his abilities (e). His perfect intimacy with the Earl, the great likeneſs of their tempers, his entire knowledge of his affairs, might very well account for the aſcendancy he had over him; but nothing of this, a very long acquaintance excepted, can be ſuggeſted with regard to Sir Henry Nevile; ſo that his intereſt with, and influence over him, could be aſcribed to nothing but his abilities (f) [E]. We now come to the main point of the conſpi-

(e) Collected from Sir Henry Nevile's own reflections of this matter.

(f) Mr. Cuffe valued himſelf highly upon this at his trial.

'into him, and for ſome days he reſolved it; but, in 'the mean time, through the interceſſion of the Earl 'of Southampton, whom Cuffe had gained, he was 'reſtored to my Lord's ear, and ſo working advan'tage upon his diſgraces, and the vain foundation of 'vulgar breath, which hurts many good men, ſpun 'out the final deſtruction of his maſter and himſelf, 'and almoſt of his reſtorer, if his pardon had not 'been won by inches. True it is that the Earl, in 'Weſtminſter-Hall, did in general diſcloſe the evil 'perſuaſions of this man: but the particulars which 'I have related, of his diſmiſſion and reſtitution he 'buried in his own breaſt, for ſome reaſons apparent 'enough. Indeed, as I conjecture, not to exaſ'perate the caſe of my Lord of Southampton, though 'he might therewithal a little peradventure have 'mollified his own. The whole and true report I 'had by infallible means, from the perſon himſelf 'that both brought the advice from the aforeſaid ex'cellent Lady, and carried the diſcharge to Cuffe, 'who, in a private chamber, was ſtrucken therewith 'into a ſwoon almoſt dead to the earth, as if he had 'fallen from ſome high ſteeple; ſuch turrets of hope 'he had built in his own fancy!' The noble Hiſtorian, who, in his junior years, conſidered the ſubject upon which the author wrote whom we have laſt mentioned, though he mentions him but very ſlightly, yet affords Mr. Cuffe quite another kind of character, and makes him to have been a much better Courtier than his maſter, one who obſerved it as a fault in him, i. e. the Earl of Eſſex, that he wore his paſſions in his countenance, that his affections or his anger were always to be read in his looks, and that he knew not how to conceal either. The noble writer's words deſerve our notice. After ſhewing that there is a ſort of diſſimulation abſolutely neceſſary in a Court, he proceeds to ſhew (14), how indifferently Eſſex was furniſhed in that particular; 'how ill, ſays he, the Earl was read 'in this philoſophy, his ſervant Cuffe (whoſe obſer'vations were ſharp enough, whatever Stoiciſms raved 'in his nature) well diſcerned when he ſaid, Amorem '& odium, ſemper in fronte geſſit, nec celare novit.

(14) Diſparity between the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Eſſex, written by the Earl of Clarendon.

[E] So that his intereſt and influence over him, could be aſcribed to nothing but his abilities.] It was from a long and intimate acquaintance with Sir Henry Nevile, that Mr. Cuffe undertook to manage ſo dangerous and ſo intricate an affair with him. This we learn from Mr. Cuffe himſelf, who, at his trial, was very much provoked by the Attorney-General's treating him as a meſſenger from the Earl of Eſſex; and this induced him to tell the Court, that he was no ſuch Mercury as Mr. Attorney was pleaſed to make him, but that in whatever he tranſacted with Sir Henry Nevile, he behaved as a principal, and as a common friend to the Earl and to the Knight (15). Indeed this is ſufficiently corroborated by the account given of this matter by Sir H. Nevile, which was read at Cuffe's trial, and what he had aſſerted is clearly confirmed. It was conceived in the following terms, allowing for the inaccuracy of the tranſcribers (16).

(15) State Trials, vol. vii. p. 59.

(16) Ibid. p. 47.

'At his (Sir Henry Nevile's) arrival out of France, 'he was told that he had ill offices done him in Court 'by divers, and ſome of great place, and his actions 'at Bullen and carriage there greatly blamed, as 'cauſing the ill ſucceſs of the peace. And by Cuffe 'it was told him, the Earl would have him know he 'was wronged, becauſe he was one that loved him. 'After this Cuffe brought him a letter from the Earl, 'thereby deſiring his love, and to hold it to him, be'ſides many other words only of compliment. To 'which letter he returned an anſwer ſuitable to ſo 'kind provocations: but all this while he never went 'to him; and being in the country within ten miles 'of the Earl, yet never went to viſit him. But 'Cuffe came to him from the Earl and told him, the 'Earl was then at liberty, and all the world that would 'might then freely come unto him: but ſtill he put 'off his going, till, at one time, Cuffe came and told 'him, the Earl expected his coming to him, and 'ſuch a day he would ſtay ſupper for him, and that 'if he came, and Cuffe chanced not to be in the way, 'a Gentleman of the Earl's ſhould attend his coming, 'and bring him to the Earl's cloſet. About eight of 'the clock that night he went to the Earl's, and was 'met by a Gentleman who brought him to his Lord, 'who entertained him kindly, and after a while, 'after many queſtions of his hopes, but uſed no undu'tiful words of the Queen or State, he parted with 'the Earl, there having nothing but ordinary terms of 'compliment paſſed between them. Afterwards, Mr. 'Cuffe repairing often to him, he aſked him at times 'how his Lord's matters ſtood in Court. At one time 'he conſpiracy, or that deſign laid for reſtoring the Earl's power and greatneſs, which ended in his own, and in his followers ruin. Here it is neceſſary to diſtinguiſh between Mr. Cuffe's ſcheme, which was contrived and never executed, and the unfortunate Earl's project, which, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, without being thought to play upon words, was executed without any contrivance. As to the firſt it was this: Mr. Cuffe perceiving that the Earl had many friends, ſome of them of great rank and quality, and that Cecil, and his aſſociates in the Miniſtry, had likewiſe many enemies, who were alſo perſons eminent by their birth, fortune, and influence, he thought that, by uniting theſe, and procuring, ſome way or other, acceſs to the Queen, a change might be made in the management of public affairs, at leaſt in her name, if not by her conſent, and the Earl thereby raiſed to a degree of power equal to his friends wants, and his own wiſhes (g). Whether this ſudden change for the preſent, was to have derived a future ſupport, by a declaration in favour of the King of Scots claim to the ſucceſſion, or whether that was to be left to farther conſideration, is a point we want lights ſufficient to determine; but, that this was really the baſis of Cuffe's project, and that he flattered himſelf it would not come within the legal conſtruction of treaſon, is what we have good grounds to believe, and, indeed, ſufficient authorities to prove (h). When things were thus far brought into order, a reſolution was taken, that a general and ſolemn meeting ſhould be had at Drury-Houſe, where the chiefs of the party might ſee each other, where they might have a full communication in reference to their ſtrength, and come to ſome reſolution as to the attempt that ſhould be made, and the ſafeſt and moſt feaſible method of making it. After much reflection and conſideration, February 2d, 1601, was fixed upon, and, accordingly, upon that day, the Aſſembly was held at the place before-mentioned (i). It is very remarkable, that the Earl of Eſſex himſelf was not preſent, to prevent, as was ſaid, any notice or umbrage being taken at Court; but, in reality, that there might be no evidence to affect him for holding ſuch an aſſembly, or thoſe who were preſent at it for conſulting with him, in caſe any thing relating to it ſhould take air. At this aſſembly Mr. Cuffe was likewiſe not preſent, but all his friends, and at his requeſt, and upon his earneſt intreaty amongſt the reſt, Sir Henry Nevile. It was propounded there, that a few perſons had got the Queen and the Government into their hands; that ſuch as they diſliked were no longer ſafe; that they daily ſuffered wrongs and oppreſſions, without any hopes of redreſs; that theſe proceedings were againſt juſtice and common right, and that the only remedy was, to obtain an audience of the Queen, in which theſe grievances might be fairly laid before her (k). After theſe preliminaries, the main point, How ſuch an audience ſhould be obtained, came under deliberation, and a ſcheme was then laid down for the Earl of Eſſex gaining acceſs to her Majeſty, and power enough to remove his enemies; but nothing was reſolved in this aſſembly, though a liſt was produced of one hundred and thirty Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen of eſtates, that were ready to embark in the Earl's cauſe, and to hazard, as indeed many of them did, and loſt too, for his ſake, their lives and fortunes (l). Such was the deſign and iſſue of the conference at Drury-Houſe, in which

'he anſwered him, well; and told him of great hopes 'conceived: at ſome other time he anſwered him 'very diſcontentedly in theſe things, ſaying it made 'no matter, it would cauſe the Earl to take other 'courſes, and ſaid there was a pretext to lay up the 'Earl of Southampton, which was a warning that 'they meant to lay up Lord Eſſex after him, but that 'the Earl was reſolved they ſhould never curb him up 'any more. Cuffe then told him, his Lord had in 'purpoſe ſome matters, but he ſhould not embark 'himſelf further in them than he liſted, and deſired 'him to give a meeting to the Earl of Southampton 'and Sir Charles Danvers: he ſaid he would, but 'with this limitation, that nothing was intended 'againſt the Queen's perſon, which was promiſed. 'But he detained them at two meetings, which cauſ-'ed them to make an ill judgment of his meaning 'towards them and the intendment. Monday, on 'Candlemas-day, ſtanding in Serjeants-Inn Gate, the 'Earls of Eſſex, Southampton, and Sir Chriſtopher 'Blount, paſſed by in a coach, whom he ſaluted paſ-'ſing, and was the firſt time he had ſeen them of 'long. Anon after, Cuffe coming to him, told him 'he had a commiſſion to deliver a ſecret unto him, 'which was, that the Earl finding his life ſought by 'men potent about her Majeſty, he was adviſed to 'make his appearance to the Queen, and go with 'ſtrength for that purpoſe, deſcribing the ſame man-'ner of taking the Court, and making way to the 'Queen, as before is ſet down by others. This 'Cuffe ſaid he was to impart to him, as one in whoſe 'love the Earl was confident. The matters being 'propounded unto him, he made many objections, 'and put great difficulties in the execution, eaſy 'perfecting of things being promiſed; my anſwer 'was, Multa ſunt quæ non laudantur niſi cum aguntur. 'When ſome perſons were named for the actors, he 'objected that if many knew it, it would not be con-'cealed; if few were uſed, it would not be performed. 'The Earl of Rutland being named for one, ſaid, 'they would not truſt him long before-hand, for if he 'knew it but two hours before he would tell. In 'concluſion, he was deſired to think of the things 'propounded in caſe they were ſhewed unto him. 'Afterward Cuffe came to him, to whom he related 'all the ſpeeches uſed in that conference, and told 'him he would not allow it, except they would con-'jure and take an oath to attempt nothing againſt the 'Queen's perſon and againſt Mr. Secretary, he would 'never do nor conſent to any thing, for he was nearer 'unto him, therefore they muſt, duce pudicè, ſpare 'him in that. Cuffe ſaid to him they would only 'have him preſent when things were doing, and if 'it fell out ſo, that he ſhould be haſtened to diſpatch 'into France before that time, he might defer it by 'feigning ſickneſs. By their appointment he ſhould 'have been Secretary. Further it is required, that 'he ſhould have ſent a Miniſter into London to find 'how the city ſtood affected to the Earl. Cuffe fur-'ther told him of a buz in many mens mouths in 'London, and that there had been warning given to 'the Mayor and Aldermen to look to the city, but 'of which Mr. Cuffe had ſo deep a ſhare, as well in the managing as in the contriving [F]. There was a ſecond meeting ſome time after, to which Mr. Cuffe uſed many intreaties with Sir Henry Nevile to come, but he abſolutely refuſed; nor would he liſten to what was propoſed, of an interview with the Earl of Eſſex, from a ſuppoſition that he was unwilling to truſt himſelf where there were ſo many people preſent; but, in reality, he had already heard much more than he was inclined to hear, foreſaw but too clearly the conſequences of the former meeting, though he was unwilling, as a man of honour, to betray thoſe who had truſted him, as well as a man of too much ſenſe to truſt himſelf in ſuch a company again (m). Things were now ſo far advanced, that it was thought dangerous to go back, at the ſame time that there was no ſafety in going forward. A great reſort of company there was to Eſſex-Houſe, and, to cover this, the maſk of religion was uſed, the Earl pretending that he ſought no relief but from ſpiritual comforts; and, for this reaſon, he had frequent ſermons there; and indeed many of the Clergy in the city ventured to pray for him, and for his preſervation; which, all things conſidered, was a very ſtrange thing (n). It is not to be ſuppoſed, that the Court was aſleep all this while, or that Sir Robert Cecil, and his friends, ſhould have ſo growing and dangerous an evil in their neighbourhood, without being appriſed of it, or providing for their own ſafety. There is very good reaſon to believe, that they were not either inattentive or ill-informed, and that having muſtered, in their own opinions, the whole force of the Lord Eſſex's party, they grew convinced, that any ſtep, tending to open force, muſt end in his deſtruction. They therefore, to quicken him, took a variety of methods of ſhewing their contempt of his intereſt, and ſuffered thoſe who had perſonal quarrels with his friends to inſult them (o). Though this went to Eſſex's heart, yet he was irreſolute, as not being able to draw together a number of perſons ſufficient to execute the ſcheme that had been talked over at Drury-Houſe. But while he delayed, in hopes of collecting ſtrength, his enemies, having provided for the total diſſipation of his ſchemes, determined not to let him linger any longer; and therefore a meſſage was ſent him on Saturday the ſeventh day of February, from Secretary Herbert, to attend him, which he excuſed, on the ſcore of his indiſpoſition; and this, as it was foreſeen it would, forced him to break out, as he did the next day, with all the force that he could collect; but being diſſwaded from attempting the Court, and failing of that aſſiſtance he expected in the city, he, and all that were with him in Eſſex-Houſe, were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners (p). By this ſudden reverſe of fortune, Mr. Cuffe found himſelf in the moſt wretched condition poſſible; for the Earl of Eſſex being tried and condemned on the 19th of February, and being ſolicited by the Divines who attended him while under ſentence, not only confeſſed matters that were prejudicial to Mr. Cuffe, and gave thoſe confeſſions under his hand, but likewiſe charged him to his face with being the author of all his misfortunes, and the perſon who principally perſwaded him to purſue violent meaſures (q). Sir Henry Nevile alſo being involved in this unhappy buſineſs, charged Mr. Cuffe with being the perſon who invited him to the meeting at Drury-Houſe, but very modeſtly, and without any circumſtances of aggravation (r). He was brought to his trial on the fifth of March following, and defended himſelf with great ſteadineſs and ſpirit (s) [G]. He was, however, convicted;

'of twenty-four Aldermen he doubted not of twenty 'at leaſt.' It is evident enough that this narrative was but indiſtinctly taken. However it is the beſt we have, and comes home to the point it was brought to prove, that Sir Henry Nevile had a great confidence in Cuffe, and that it was chiefly from this he was drawn to meddle in the affair.

[F] In which Mr. Cuffe had ſo deep a ſhare, as well in the managing as in the contriving.] There is one point left much in the dark in the laſt note, which therefore ſhould be explained in this. It is confeſſed that Sir Henry Nevile was privy to the propoſals made, and the reſolutions taken, in the conſultation at Drury Houſe, and it was for his knowledge of them, and for that only, that Cuffe died: it is requiſite therefore that the reader ſhould be acquainted with what thoſe propoſitions were, and this he ſhall be told with all the ſuccinctneſs poſſible (17). Sir Chriſtopher Blount was, with a choice detachment, to poſſeſs himſelf of the Palace Gate; Davis was to ſeize the Hall; Danvers the Guard-Chamber, which was but ſlightly watched, and the Preſence-Chamber; and Eſſex was to ruſh in from the Meuſe, which were ſtables belonging to the Court, with a ſelect party at his heels, and to beg the Queen on his knees to remove his adverſaries from her preſence, to bring them upon their trial, and then to call a Parliament and make a change in the government. This moſt certainly was not originally Mr. Cuffe's ſcheme, but was made up of his and Sir Chriſtopher Blount's blended together, and to which, in the end, Mr. Cuffe was brought to aſſent, as the only one that was practicable. Of this it was that Sir Henry Nevile gave his opinion, that ſome things were not to be applauded till they were atchieved, and of this it is not improbable, that he gave ſome hints to the Court, at leaſt ſomething like this was ſaid by Secretary Cecil at Cuffe's trial. We now ſee the very depth of this affair, and in what manner, and by what degrees, Mr. Cuffe plunged into this treaſonable abyſs, out of which, though there were ſome who eſcaped, yet it is generally thought that they left the beſt part of their eſtates behind them.

(17) Camd. Ann. Eliz. p. 839.

[G] And defended himſelf with great ſteadineſs and ſpirit.] When the Attorney-General Coke opened a charge againſt Mr. Cuffe, he did it with all that violence which was ſo natural to him (18): he told him that he was the erranteſt traitor that ever came to the bar; he was polypragma, the very ſeducer of the Earl, and added, that, ſince he was a ſcholar and a ſophiſter, he would frame him a ſyllogiſm, and bid him deny which part he would. The ſyllogiſm was this, Whoſoever commits rebellion intends the Queen's death, but you committed rebellion, ergo, you intended the Queen's death. After abundance of other hard ſayings he enters into the charge, but without producing any witneſs, or any kind of proof, excepting the confeſſion of Sir Henry Nevile, and the ſtories that Secretary Cecil was pleaſed to tell upon the Bench, of the confeſſions of the Earl of Eſſex and of the Earl of Southampton, all which were in this general manner uſed as evidence that Cuffe was the great framer and victed; and, as he was looked upon as the principal author of this fatal buſineſs; conſidered as a man of dangerous capacity; and having had no ſort of intelligence with thoſe that were then in favour, he was, with Sir Gelly Merrick, executed at Tyburn, March 30th, 1601, and died with great conſtancy and courage (t) [H]. His character has been harſhly (t) Stowe's Annals, p. 795.

manager of all theſe dangerous deſigns. At length, Mr. Cuffe being allowed to ſpeak for himſelf, ſaid, 'the matters objected againſt him were many, and 'urged againſt him with all force of wit; therefore, 'for the help of his weak memory, he would reduce 'all unto two heads, things plotted, and things acted. 'For the firſt of them, Mr. Attorney thinks he hath 'concluded me in mood and figure, but my anſwer 'is, that if a man may be excuſed of treaſon by committing nothing, I am clear. Yet the number of 'matters heaped upon me, and the inferences and 'enforcements of the ſame uſed againſt me, to make 'me odious, make me ſeem alſo as a monſter of many 'heads in this buſineſs. But ſince by the law all 'accuſations are to be believed, and facts weighed, as 'by evidence they are proved, and things are beſt 'proved being ſingled; I will beſeech Mr. Attorney, 'that we may inſiſt upon ſome point certain, and 'not, as in a ſtream, have all things at once brought 'upon me with violence. For my being in Eſſex 'Houſe the Sunday, I hope it ſhall be conſtrued as in 'the caſe of others. Then, if thoſe who only had 'their being within the walls of that houſe, and no 'hand nor head in that action, were not traitors, I 'hope, that in favour and in charity, you will accordingly judge of me, who ſpent all that day locked up in my chamber amongſt my books, and never 'appeared unto any man till all was yielded up to my 'Lord Admiral. To conclude me to be a traitor, 'becauſe I was in the houſe where treaſon was committed, by the ſame reaſon, if a lion had been there 'locked up in a grate, he had been in caſe of treaſon. 'But whereas your argument, Mr. Attorney, is this, 'that whoſoever intends treaſon, and the ſame is 'afterwards acted by others, there the intender, as 'well as the actor, is a traitor; but I intended treaſon, 'and others acted it, ergo. Mr. Attorney it is not 'your major that I deny, becauſe my Lords the 'Judges have determined that, but I deny your minor. 'For if the thing intended was the going to the Court, 'yet the thing acted was the going into London.' But Mr. Attorney-General taking him ſhort upon his own confeſſion, concluded him a traitor, for in treaſon the very intent is treaſon, if the ſame can be proved. Now it is confeſſed by Mr. Cuffe, that he intended the taking of the Court, which in itſelf is treaſon. Mr. Cuffe ſaid, 'My Lords, the matters forced upon me 'ſo amaze me, as I know not what to ſay: but I beſeech you, even as yourſelves ſhall be judged, judge 'ſo of me both by my words and deeds, for this is the 'law both of God and man; and let not the accuſations of others, or arguments now forced ſo far, have 'power againſt me, as to take from me my juſt defence. I am further charged with contriving plots 'for reſtoring the Earl to greatneſs. True, I muſt 'confeſs, as a ſervant that longed for the honour of 'his maſter, I have often wiſhed to ſee his recalling to 'the Court, and reſtoring to her Majeſty's former 'favour, but beyond the limits of theſe deſires my 'thoughts never carried me, nor aſpired to other 'greatneſs, than to ſee him again in place of a ſervant and worthy ſubject as before he had been. 'And whereas I ſtand accuſed to be as one that turned 'the wheel, which elſe had ſtood, and to be the ſtirrer 'of his mind, which otherwiſe had ſettled to another 'courſe; to clear this I had written two lines, which 'you, Mr. Secretary, knew the Earl would have ſubſcribed if he might have been ſuffered.' But Mr. Secretary affirmed, he perceived no ſuch purpoſe in the Earl, neither remembered any ſuch matter in that which was written. Said Cuffe, 'You know, Mr. 'Secretary, my paper being read to the Earl as he 'read, he ſaid, ſtill as he went, true, true.' At the importunity of Mr. Cuffe, Mr. Secretary willed the paper ſhould be read, but it tended only unto this, that if he knew of the Earl's intent to go to the Court, it was with ſuch limitations as the Earl had propounded, otherwiſe not, for he had not ſuggeſted any of theſe new practices. Mr. Attorney, to cut ſhort this defence, began his reply with telling him, 'Come 'Mr. Cuffe, I will give you a cuff ſhall ſet you down;' and then ordered part of the Earl's and Sir Henry Nevile's confeſſion, to be read. Mr. Secretary Cecil then queſtioned Mr. Cuffe, What was meant with reſpect to a Parliament? to which he anſwered that if theſe ſchemes had ſucceeded, many alterations would have followed, and that, for the ſettling of things, a Parliament might then have become neceſſary. Mr. Attorney-General was pleaſed to inform the Court, that, in that Parliament, Mr. Cuffe was to have been Speaker. The Jury found him guilty, in which Mr. Cuffe ſaid that they had done but right in diſcharging their conſciences; he took notice, that when he was ſeized he had but two ſhillings about him, but that there were three hundred and fifty pounds in ready money taken in his chamber; he ſaid, that, upon his being firſt carried to the Tower, he was put into a very bad place, but that he was afterwards removed into a better, where he deſired to continue, which was afterwards granted; he farther requeſted, that he might have a Divine ſent him, and be allowed the uſe of pen, ink, and paper, which were alſo promiſed. Mr. Camden, in his account of Cuffe's trial, ſays (19), that the Lord Chief Juſtice Anderſon, told both the Attorney-General and Mr. Cuffe, that they were but indifferent diſputants, and preſſed the ſtatute of treaſon, by which Cuffe was concluded, ſince it appeared that he was acquainted with what paſſed in the conference at Drury Houſe, and the propoſal of putting the Queen under a force, and ſhewed his approbation of it by citing, in converſation, to Sir Henry Nevile, a paſſage from the poet Lucan, implying, that where juſtice is denied, it might be obtained by force:

(19) Camd. Ann. Eliz. p. 866.

—— Arma tenenti
Omnia dat, qui juſta negat.

Mr. Fuller, who affects to treat every ſubject merrily, ſays (20), humorouſly enough, that this might be ſtiled Mr. Cuffe's neck-verſe, in which how improperly ſoever he ſhews his wit, yet certainly he ſhews his judgment at the ſame time, for without doubt the quoting theſe verſes was the higheſt treaſon that Cuffe committed, and the only proof that he conſented to the project of putting a force upon the Queen, which, in the conſtruction of the law, was treaſon; yet this is ſo far from being proved by two witneſſes, that it could only have been proved by one, and even he was not produced. Such, in compariſon of thoſe in which we live, was the juſtice, or rather ſeverity, of former times.

(20) Worthies in Somerſetſhire, p. 28.

[H] And died with great conſtancy and courage.] It was an obſervation of Secretary Cecil's, that Cuffe was as ſilent under his misfortunes, as his maſter was open. Indeed there was ſomething very extraordinary in the Earl of Eſſex's behaviour; for, when he once began to confeſs, he charged every body that had any kindneſs for him, as having a hand in his plot; ſuch as the Lord Montjoy, his ſucceſſor in Ireland, and many others; ſo that the very number of them rendered a proſecution unſafe, which is a farther proof that Cuffe's original ſcheme might have ſucceeded, had it been coolly and carefully purſued. The Earl, to prove his ſincerity, deſired to ſee Mr. Cuffe, whom he exhorted to confeſs, as he did, with many paſſionate expreſſions, adding at laſt (21), 'I muſt tell you 'plainly, that this inſtance of diſloyalty is purely owing to your advice.' Mr. Camden tells us, that Mr. Cuffe was ſurprized at this, and in few words, but to the purpoſe, charged the Earl with weakneſs and levity in betraying his friends (22). This was before Mr. Cuffe's trial, and how handſomely he acted thereat has been already ſhewn. At the place of execution all writers agree, that he behaved with the utmoſt reſolution, and the moſt ſteady compoſure.

harſhly treated by Lord Bacon (u) and Sir Henry Wotton (w), and ſome other writers. Camden alſo, who knew him intimately, and had lived for many years in great friendſhip with him, beſtows on him a ſhort but bitter reflection. Others are milder in their cenſures, and all allow him to have been a very learned and very able man. He wrote a book in Engliſh, that was printed after his death ſeveral times, and has been much commended (x): and, beſides this, there is another work of his that was never printed, of both which we ſhall give ſome account in the notes [I]. He delivered himſelf, upon this melancholy occaſion, in the following words: 'I am brought hither to pay 'my laſt debt to nature, and to ſuffer for crimes 'committed againſt God, my Prince, and my country; and as I cannot but diſcern the infinite juſtice 'of God, when I reflect on the multitude of my offences, ſo can I as little doubt but the ſeverity of 'my puniſhment will make way for my admiſſion into 'the embraces of his mercy. We are expoſed here 'as ſad ſpectacles, and inſtances of human frailty: 'the death we are to undergo carries a frightful 'aſpect, (for even the beſt of men deſire life), beſides that 'tis as full of ignominy as terror. However, 'tis the portion of the beſt of ſaints, with 'whom I aſſuredly hope to riſe again in Chriſt. Not 'that I would be thought by any one to depend upon 'my own merits, which I abſolutely diſcard, but I 'place my entire truſt and dependance in the atonement of my Saviour's blood. I am fully perſuaded, that, whoever feels a ſecret conſolation within 'himſelf whilſt he groans under the infliction of any 'earthly puniſhment, is chaſtiſed by God with a 'paternal tenderneſs, and not in an angry and judicial way. But to come to the cauſe of my death. 'There is nobody here can be poſſibly ignorant, 'what a wild commotion was raiſed on the 8th of 'February, by a particular great, but unadviſed, 'Earl. I do here call God, his angels, and my own 'conſcience, to witneſs, that I was not in the leaſt 'concerned therein, but was ſhut up on that whole 'day within the houſe, where I ſpent my time in 'very melancholy reflections.' Here he was interrupted, and adviſed not to diſguiſe the truth by diſtinctions, nor palliate his crime by ſpecious pretences. Then he proceeded in theſe words: 'I confeſs 'tis a 'crime as black as treaſon, for a ſubject, who has 'loſt his Prince's favour, to force his way to the 'royal preſence. For my own part, I never perſuaded any man to take up arms againſt the Queen, 'but am moſt heartily concerned, for being an inſtrument of bringing that worthy Gentleman, Sir 'Henry Nevile, into danger; and do moſt earneſtly 'intreat his pardon: and whereas I ſaid, that one 'and twenty Aldermen out of the twenty-four were 'devoted to the Earl's intereſt, I only meant that 'they were his friends, and ready to ſerve him, but 'not in the way of open rebellion.' Here he was again interrupted, and ſo began to apply himſelf to his devotions, which he managed with a great deal of fervour, and then, making a ſolemn profeſſion of his creed, and aſking pardon of God and the Queen, he was diſpatched by the executioner. A man, ſays Camden, of moſt exquiſite learning, and of a penetrating, but ſeditious and crooked, wit (23). Ver exquiſitiſſima doctrina, ingenioque acerrimo, ſed turbido & tortuoſo.

[I] Of both which we ſhall give ſome account in the notes.] As for Mr. Cuffe's book, it was, for ſome time after his deceaſe, handed about at Oxford in manuſcript, and conſidered as a very great curioſity. Mr. Anthony Wood tells us, he wrote it in the year 1600, that is, a very little before his death. About ſix years after it was printed under this title:

The Differences of the Ages of Man's Life, together with the original Cauſes, Progreſs, and End, thereof. Written by the learned Henry Cuffe, ſome time Fellow of Merton-college in Oxford. Lond. 1607, 1638, 8*vo*; 1640, 12*mo*. There is ſomething in this piece very curious and philoſophical; and though, at this time of day, what between our proficiency in experimental philoſophy, in which he was but a beginner, and the uncouthneſs of his ſtile, which was the fault of his time, much of the beauty of his work is loſt; yet the ſtrength of his thoughts, the accuracy of his method, and his connected manner of reaſoning, leave no reaſon at all to doubt, that he deſerved the commendations that have been beſtowed upon him. Mr. Wood ſays (24), that he left behind him many other things ready for the preſs, which were never publiſhed; but he does not think fit to tell us any of their titles. All that we can ſupply from the enquiries of the indefatigable Biſhop Tanner, is the following title of one piece, and the place where it is, or at leaſt was once, to be found (25):

We will conclude this note with the judicious and ſalutary reflection of a celebrated author, upon the uneaſy life, and unfortunate death, of this extraordinary perſon of whom we have been ſpeaking, which teaches the uſe of theſe kind of Hiſtories, and ſhews, that we may borrow as beneficial improvements from contemplating the lives of unhappy men, as from the peruſal of the ſwelling memoirs of perſons more indebted to Fortune for her favours (27). 'Mingle not, ſays he, 'your intereſt with a great man's, made deſperate 'by debts or Court injuries, whoſe breakings out 'prove fatal to their wiſeſt followers and friends, 'averred in the laſt Earl of Eſſex but one, where 'Merrick his Steward, and Cuffe his Secretary, 'though of excellent parts, were both hanged. (27) Oſborn's Advice to his Son, P. i. cap. iv.

[* From Dr. Birch's memoirs of the reign of Queen Elizabeth it appears, that Mr. Cuff was one of the Secretaries to the Earl of Eſſex ſo early as in 1696, and that he accompanied the Earl in his expedition againſt Cadiz. After the ſucceſsful event of the expedition, Cuff was diſpatched with his Lordſhip's letters to England, and, when he had landed, endeavoured, with the utmoſt ſpeed, to arrive with them at the Court. Being, however, unfortunately taken ill on the road, he was obliged to ſend up the letters, incloſed in one of his own, to Mr. Reynoldes, another of the Earl's Secretaries. Mr. Cuff, agreeably to large inſtructions which he had received from his Lordſhip, had drawn up a diſcourſe concerning the great action at Cadiz, which the Earl purpoſed to be publiſhed as ſoon as poſſible, both to ſtop all vagrant rumours, and to inform thoſe, that were well affected, of the truth of the whole. It was, at the ſame time, to be ſo contrived, that neither his Lordſhip's name, nor Cuff's, nor any other perſon's, connected with the Earl, ſhould either be openly mentioned, uſed, or in ſuch a manner inſinuated, as that the moſt ſlender gueſs could be made, who was the penman. The publication was to have the appearance of a letter that came from Cadiz, and the title of it was to be, "A true relation of the action "at Cadiz, the 21ſt of June, under the Earl of "Eſſex and the Lord Admiral, ſent to a Gentleman "in Court from one that ſerved there in good place." Sir Anthony Aſhley, who was entruſted with the deſign, acted a treacherous part on this occaſion. He betrayed the ſecret to the Queen, and the Lords of her Council; the conſequence of which was, that Mr. Fulke Grevill was charged by her Majeſty to command Mr. Cuff, upon pain of death, not to ſet forth any diſcourſe concerning the expedition with-well as the manner of his death, rendered him the theme of much diſcourſe in his own times; and our general Hiſtorians have mentioned him in ſuch a manner, as might have raiſed the curioſity of their readers, to be more particularly informed. The Reverend Mr. Fuller (y) has given him a place amongſt his Worthies in Somerſetſhire; honeſt Anthony Wood (z) has treated him with great fairneſs and freedom; and the learned and induſtrious Biſhop Tanner (a) has ſpoken of him, as indeed he does of every body, with great candour, accuracy, and decency. Theſe authorities will ſufficiently juſtify the giving his Memoirs a place in this collection, more eſpecially as it has afforded an opportunity of ſetting ſeveral hiſtorical circumſtances relating to a very dark and intricate affair, in a clear and true light. His death hindered not his limbs from being interred, though we are not able to ſay where; though the manner of it did, as it well might, deprive him of a monument. An old friend of his, however, ventured to embalm his memory in an Epigram (b), with which, being very ſhort, we ſhall conclude:

In the firſt volume of the Annual Regiſter, and the forty-third of the Gentleman's Magazine, the following remarkable ſpeech is given, as the dying ſpeech of Mr. Cuff. "I am here adjudged to die, "for acting an act never plotted, for plotting a plot "never acted. Juſtice will have her courſe; ac- "cuſers muſt be heard; greatneſs will have the "victory. The "Queen is diſpleaſed, the Lawyers injurious, and "Death terrible. But I crave pardon of the Queen; "forgive the Lawyers, and the World; deſire to be "forgiven; and welcome death (29)."

(29) Annual Regiſter, vol. i. p. 377. Gentleman's Mag. vol. xiiii. p. 112.

There is a conciſe energy and ſpirit in this ſpeech, which cannot fail of exciting the admiration of our readers; and, from its being ſo excellently ſuited to the genius and character of Cuff, it carries in it no ſmall degree of internal evidence that it was actually delivered by him. We could have wiſhed, however, that its authenticity had been particularly aſcertained. This was the more deſirable, as it does not accord with the ſpeech that is given in note [H], and which appears to be founded on the beſt authority.

In the Epiſtolæ Franciſci et Johannis Hotomanorum, Patris et Filii, et clarorum Virorum ad eos, are ſeveral letters by Cuff, to John Hotman. Theſe are ſaid to exhibit diſtinguiſhed marks of genius and learning; to be written in elegant Latin; and to contain ſome curious particulars. It was, therefore, our earneſt deſire to avail ourſelves of them; but, after much enquiry, we were not fortunate enough to obtain a copy of the work. We hope to ſupply the defect on a future occaſion.] K.

CUMBERLAND (RICHARD), a very learned Divine, and Biſhop of Peterborough in the cloſe of the laſt and beginning of the preſent century. He was the ſon of an honeſt citizen of London, who, by his induſtry, acquired a competent, though not a great fortune (a). This Reverend Prelate was born in the pariſh of St. Ann near Alderſgate, July 15th, 1632, though his father lived afterwards in Fleet-ſtreet (b). He received the firſt tincture of letters in St. Paul's School, under the care of Mr. John Langley (c), and was removed from thence to Magdalen-College in Cambridge, where he was contemporary with ſome very worthy and learned perſons; ſuch as Dr. Hezekiah Burton, his intimate friend and acquaintance, a very learned and pious Divine; Dr. Hollings, an eminent Phyſician at Shrewſbury; Sir Samuel Moreland, admired for his ſkill in the Mathematics; the celebrated Mr. Pepys, Secretary to the Admiralty; and the Lord Keeper Bridgeman, to whom himſelf, and his friend Dr. Burton, were Chaplains at the ſame time (d). He was very remarkable, while Fellow of his College, for his diligent application to his ſtudies, as well as for the unaffected piety, and unblemiſhed probity, of his life. It does not appear in what year this excellent perſon came to the Univerſity, but from circumſtances it may be very eaſily collected, and we have reaſon to think it was in 1649 (e). He took his Bachelor of Arts degree in 1653 (f), and in 1656 he became Maſter of Arts (g), at which time he had thoughts of applying himſelf to Phyſic, which he actually ſtudied for ſome time (h). He was incorporated Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford, July 14th, 1657 (i). He went out Bachelor of Divinity at a public commencement at his own Univerſity, A. D. 1663, with univerſal applauſe (k). His firſt preferment was the Rectory of Brampton in the Deanery of Haddon, in the Archdeaconry and county of Northampton, which was given him by Sir John Norwich. The Patron was not diſappointed in having a Clerk, who, in all reſpects, anſwered his higheſt expectations, and they lived together in the greateſt unanimity (l). This worthy Gentleman was deſcended of a moſt antient and noble family, and was advanced to the dignity of a Baronet ronet by King Charles the First. Brampton was his own parish, where he lived in great privacy and retirement. Mr. Cumberland was admitted December 3d, 1658, upon the demise of the Reverend Mr. John Ward (m); and after the Restoration, having never had the least scruple to the authority of the Church, he had a legal institution, and read the Thirty-nine Articles, as directed by law, November 24th, 1661 (n), and was, the same year, appointed one of the twelve Preachers in the University of Cambridge. This, however, was a temporary avocation only, owing to the high character he had raised by the masterly manner in which he had performed all academical exercises, and from which he quickly returned to the duties of his parochial charge. In this rural retirement he minded little else than the duties of his function, and his studies. His relaxations from these were very few besides his journies to Cambridge, which he made frequently, to preserve a correspondence with his learned acquaintance in that place. Here he thought to have remained, and here he might have remained during the course of his whole life, if his intimate friend and kind benefactor Sir Orlando Bridgeman, upon his receiving the Seals in 1667, had not sent for him up to London, made him his Chaplain, and soon after bestowed upon him the living of Alhallows in Stamford (o). He discharged the functions of his ministry in that great town with indefatigable diligence; for, besides the duties incumbent upon him by his parochial charge, he accepted of the weekly lecture, and, by this means, was obliged to preach three times every week in the same church (p). This difficult province he went through constantly and assiduously; and though this alone would have been a burthen too heavy for an ordinary man, he discharged it with so much ease, that he carried on at the same time great designs in his Philosophical, Mathematical, and Philological Studies. He gave a noble proof of this, and one which equally demonstrated the soundness of his morals, and the solidity of his parts, in publishing his Philosophical ENQUIRY into the LAWS of NATURE; a book deserving universal applause, and received with the applause that it deserved [A]. He was not in the least elevated with the praises

[A] And received with the applause that it deserved.] The title of this work at large runs thus: De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica, in qua earum forma, summa Capita, Ordo, Promulgatio, & Obligatio è rerum naturâ investigantur; quinetiam Elementa Philosophiæ Hobbeianæ, tum moralis tum civilis, considerantur & refutantur. Londini 1672, 4*to.* i. e. 'A Philosophical Enquiry into the Laws of Nature, in which 'their Form, principal Heads, Order, Promulgation, and Obligation, are investigated from the 'nature of things; and in which also the Philosophical Elements of Hobbes, moral as well as civil, are 'considered and refuted.' This book was written while he was Chaplain to Sir Orlando Bridgeman, to whom it was dedicated, and there is prefixed to it a short Preface to the reader, by the author's friend and fellow Chaplain to the Lord Keeper, Dr. Hezekiah Burton. Dr. Cumberland being at a distance from the press when this book was published, it came into the world very incorrectly printed, and in subsequent editions these faults were multiplied in a very surprizing manner (1). We may hence form an idea of the excellency of a work, that could, notwithstanding, support it's author's reputation both at home and abroad, and be constantly esteemed one of the best performances that ever appeared, and that too upon one of the nicest and most important subjects. Mr. Payne says very justly, that it was one of the first pieces written in a demonstrative way on a moral subject, and at the same time the perfectest (2). It is indeed on all hands admitted, that the Philosopher of Malmsbury was never so closely handled, or his notions so thoroughly sifted, as by Dr. Cumberland. He has however taken a new road, very different from Grotius, Puffendorff, and other writers, more difficult, and less entertaining indeed, but, at the same time, much more convincing. It was desired that a piece of such general utility should be made better known by being put into an easier method, and translated into the English language. This the author would not oppose, though he did not undertake it; being very sensible that the obscurity complained of by some, was really in the subject itself, and would be found so by those who meddled with it. The project however was pursued by James Tyrrel, Esq; grandson to the famous Archbishop Usher, who published his performance under the following title: A brief Disquisition of the Law of Nature, according to the principles and method laid down in the Reverend Dr. Cumberland's (now Lord Bishop of Peterborough) Latin Treatise on that Subject; as also his Confutations of Mr. Hobbes's Principles, put into another Method, with the author's approbation (3). Mr. Payne, whom we have so often quoted, gives us a very honest and fair account of a design that he also had of the same nature. After mentioning the prejudice that this work had received from it's ill usage at the press, he proceeds thus: 'This may have been some discouragement to the 'reading it, though the difficulty of the subject, and 'the closeness of the reasoning, has been a greater. 'Hardly any men hitherto have made themselves 'acquainted with the argument of it, but such as 'are in the uppermost form of learning. I have 'sometimes wished that his Lordship would have 'been pleased to have revised it, and tried to make 'it more easy and intelligible; but it had lain so long 'out of his hands, that he did not care to take it up 'again. He gave me leave to attempt any thing of 'that kind if I would, and as a help he gave me his 'own interleaved book, which has here and there a 'little addition. I read his book over and over diligently with this view, but never found where I 'could well alter any thing, where I could leave out, 'or where I could add. All I can think on to give 'a little advantage to common readers, is to print 'the book correctly, to give an Analysis of the argumentation, to add contents to each paragraph, and 'to divide them oftener. This I may perhaps find 'leisure to do (4).' It is not impossible, that the Rev. Mr. Payne might be diverted from this purpose of his, which certainly would have been very welcome to the learned world, by a like attempt made some few years after, while he was employed in publishing the Bishop's Posthumous Works, by a Reverend Divine of the kingdom of Ireland, who very probably never heard of his intention, or of the singular advantages he had, and which must have enabled him to perform it better than any other man. This last mentioned gentleman printed an English translation of our Prelate's book by subscription, under the following title: 'A Treatise of the Laws 'of Nature, by the Right Reverend Father in God 'Richard Cumberland, Lord Bishop of Peterborough; 'made English from the Latin by John Maxwell, 'A. M. Prebendary of Connor, and Chaplain to his 'Excellency the Lord Carteret, Lord Lieutenant of 'Ireland: To which is prefixed, an Introduction 'concerning the mistaken notions which the Heathens had of the Deity, and the defects in their Morapraiſes beſtowed upon him, not only by the world in general, but by perſons of the moſt diſtinguiſhed merit and learning, upon the ſcore of this excellent performance (q). He went on doing his duty with the ſame calmneſs and chearfulneſs as before; and, in this ſtation of a private Clergyman, ſo great was his reputation, that he was importuned by the Univerſity, and by other acquaintance, to take upon him the weighty exerciſe of reſponding at the public Commencement. Nothing but the earneſt ſollicitation of his friends could have prevailed with a man, void not only of ambition but of even the deſire of applauſe, to appear ſo publicly. This he did in the year 1680, in ſo maſterly a manner, that, for many years after, the memory of his performance remained freſh in that Univerſity (r) [B]. The next ſpecimen of his great abilities and profound learning appeared in the year 1686, in his ESSAY on Jewiſh MEASURES and WEIGHTS; a work written with the utmoſt ſagacity, and in which qualities are diſcovered that ſeldom are found in the ſame mind, a deep penetration, extenſive reading, a ſtrong and accurate judgment, together with a candour ſeldom to be met with, and an unaffected humility, which, in conjunction with ſuch talents, is truly admirable (s). It was a work not only highly uſeful in its nature, but very much wanted, and was therefore received with the higheſt applauſe by the beſt judges, who were equally pleaſed with the method and matter, as well as the manner and conciſeneſs, of the performance. It was afterwards reprinted, and will continue to ſupport the reputation of its author, as long as this kind of literature is either encouraged or underſtood (t) [C]. His ſincere attachment to the Proteſtant Religion made

‘ Morality, whence the uſefulneſs of Revelation may ‘ appear. At the end is ſubjoined an Appendix con- ‘ taining two Diſcourſes, 1. Concerning the Im- ‘ materiality of thinking Subſtance. 2. [B] Remained freſh in that univerſity.] Theſe kind of exerciſes are common in the univerſity, which, however, does not hinder their being performed with great ſtrictneſs and punctuality; and, as this is always done before a numerous audience, compoſed of perſons who are all of them proper judges, we may be ſatisfied, that whenever diſcourſes are not only received with a temporary applauſe, but dwell upon the memory of ſuch as hear them, and are talked of for many years after, they muſt have an extraordinary degree of merit to recommend them. The topicks that were now handled by our learned and accompliſhed author, were equally weighty and important in themſelves, and, at the ſame time, of a no leſs nice and delicate a nature, ſuch as, demonſtrating his zeal for the Church of England, muſt, at the ſame time, deprive him of any aſſiſtance from either of the two oppoſite factions, each of which, at that time, was known to have a conſiderable influence. The theſes maintained by him were (5), 1. Sancto Petro nulla data eſt juriſdictio in cæteros Apoſtolos; i. e. St. Peter had no juriſdiction granted him over the reſt of the Apoſtles. 2. [C] Is either encouraged or underſtood.] The title of his book at large runs thus: An Eſſay towards the recovery of the Jewiſh Meaſures and Weights, comprehending their Monies, by help of an ancient Standard, compared with ours of England, uſeful alſo to ſtate many of thoſe of the Greeks, Romans, and Eaſtern Nations. Lond. 1686, 8*vo.*’ The Dedication of this book to Samuel Pepys, Eſq; then Preſident of the Royal Society, is dated October 28, 1685, and from thence it may not be amiſs to tranſcribe a paragraph or two, becauſe they ſhew the reaſon why this piece was written. ‘ Becauſe, Sir, the improvement of ‘ natural knowledge, for which the Royal Society ‘ was founded, may be attained, in ſome degree, by ‘ recovering ſome parts thereof which the Antients ‘ had, but are now unknown, I thought it not im- ‘ proper to preſent to you, who deſervedly preſide ‘ in that illuſtrious Society, this attempt to reſtore ‘ thoſe eldeſt ſtandards of meaſures and weights, ‘ which are mentioned in the moſt antient records, ‘ the Sacred Scriptures, as commonly known when ‘ they were written. But ſuch hath been the igno- ‘ rance and careleſſneſs in theſe matters, of many ‘ intervehient ages, by whoſe care theſe things ſhould ‘ have been tranſmitted to us their poſterity, that ‘ moſt of our late diligent enquirers have declared ‘ their opinion to be, that though the retrieving of ‘ them be highly deſirable, yet that ſucceſs in ſuch ‘ an endeavour is ſcarce to be hoped. Nevertheleſs, ‘ being deſired by ſome learned Divines of our ‘ Church, in ſubſerviency to ſome brief Annotations ‘ on the Bible, by them intended, to do the beſt I ‘ could in this affair, I have, by this treatiſe, at- ‘ tempted to reſcue this moſt antient and uſeful piece ‘ of learning from the grave of oblivion and neglect, ‘ into which many deſpairing men were caſting it, ‘ before it was quite dead, or paſt recovery. Learn- ‘ ing I call this knowledge of weights and meaſures, ‘ becauſe the firſt conſtitution of them, and the rea- ‘ ſon and proportions contained in their mutual cor- ‘ reſpondencies, do import not only prudent obſer- ‘ vation which is learning's foundation, but alſo ‘ ſome elements of Geometry, Arithmetick, and ‘ Staticks, which are eſſential parts of its ſuper- ‘ ſtructure, thence peculiarly called μαθηματα, or, ‘ The Learning. And for this cauſe I have been ‘ forced, in the proſecution of this enquiry, to call ‘ in to my aſſiſtance ſome of the eaſieſt mathematical ‘ notions, which are as old almoſt as mankind, aſſo- ‘ ciating thereunto ſome obſervations of nature, ‘ whoſe conſtancy, from the beginning, gives reaſon ‘ to believe, that they were known early by men, ‘ together with the eldeſt works of art, remaining in ‘ the pyramids, ſhekels, and other remains of Eaſtern ‘ and Weſtern antiquity; that, from the concurrent ‘ evidence of theſe aged witneſſes, I might be en- ‘ abled to give this my verdict, which is now brought ‘ in before you.’ We have no account any where of the Annotations, for the furtherance of which this diſcourſe was written; but, from the friendſhip between their authors, and ſome other circumſtances, I am inclined to think they were the Commentaries of Dr. Patrick, Biſhop of Ely (6). In another part of his Dedication, our author obſerves to his patron, that nothing pleaſed him better, or gave him greater comfort in the proſecution of the difficult taſk he had undertaken, than that it related not to any quarrelſome intereſt, but the peaceable doctrine of meaſures and weights, which in their general nature are the common concern of all mankind, as being the neceſſary inſtruments of juſt dealing and fair commerce between all nations. He mentions alſo his own induſtry in avoiding all appearance of contention, which had led him ſo far as not to name the known diverſities of opinion amongſt men about this matter. All this, however, did not ſecure him from contradiction; for a certain writer attacked him, though without naming him (7), and our author wrote ſome ſheets to juſtify his calculations: but his affection for peace was ſo great, that after all he laid them aſide, and left his book to ſhift for itſelf, which it has done very well. A celebrated Journaliſt has given a very large extract of this work (8), which ſhews how much he eſteemed it; as, on the other hand, that certainly does made him very apprehenſive of its danger; and the melancholy proſpect of affairs in the reign of King James made ſo deep an impreſſion on this excellent perſon, as to contribute to a dangerous fit of ſickneſs, one of the ſevereſt fevers from which ever man recovered. He continued after the Revolution in the ſame ſituation as before, and without any thoughts of ſoliciting for better preferment. Indeed, through the whole courſe of his life, this ſeems never to have entered into his head: he was always content with the lot that befel him, and applied himſelf, with the utmoſt vigour and diligence, to diſcharge his duty in that ſtation where Providence had placed him (u). It was, therefore, a greater ſurprize to himſelf than to any-body elſe, when walking, after his uſual manner, on a poſt day to the coffee-houſe, he read there in a newſpaper, that one Dr. Cumberland, of Stamford, was named to the Biſhopric of Peterborough. This piece of intelligence however proved true, and he had the ſingular ſatisfaction of finding himſelf raiſed to a Biſhopric, not only without pains or anxiety, but without having ſo much as fought for it (w). This accidental, we ought rather to ſay providential, promotion, was highly honourable for him. It was looked upon, at that time, as a thing neceſſary to the eſtabliſhment of the new government, that men, who were to be raiſed to ſuch high ſtations in the Church, ſhould be ſuch only as had been moſt eminent for their learning, moſt exemplary in their lives, and firmeſt to the Proteſtant intereſt. Whilſt theſe qualifications were only conſidered, ſuch a man could not eaſily be overlooked, though he himſelf did leaſt of any man look for ſuch a promotion. The King was told, that Dr. Cumberland was the fitteſt man he could nominate to the biſhopric of Peterborough. Thus a private country Clergyman, without poſting to Court, a place he had rarely ſeen, without ſuing to great men, without taking the leaſt ſtep towards ſoliciting for it, was pitched upon to fill ſo great a truſt, only becauſe he was fitteſt for it [D]. He was elected in the room of Dr. Thomas White, who refuſed the new oath, May 15th; was conſecrated, with other Biſhops, July 5th; and inthronized September 12th, 1691, in the Cathedral of Peterborough (x). Thus in the ſixtieth year of his age, when his parts were as ſtrong as ever, his body unbroken with infirmities, and his experience at a juſt height, he entered on a new ſcene. He now applied himſelf to the work of a Biſhop. Studious men acquire habits, that make them not overforward to put themſelves out into action. The ſpeculations of their minds employ the whole man. The natural calmneſs of his Lordſhip's temper added ſtill to this diſpoſition: yet no man took more care not to be defective in his proper duty. He made no omiſſions to conſult his own eaſe, or to ſpare his pains; and the deſires of his mind, that all under him ſhould do their duty, were very earneſt and ſincere. His compoſition had no alloy of vain glory. He never did any thing to court applauſe, or gain the praiſe of men. He never acted a part, never put on a maſk. His tongue and heart always went together. If he ran into any extreme, it was the exceſs of humility, the ſafeſt ſide for every Chriſtian to err on. He lived with the ſimplicity and plainneſs of a primitive Biſhop, converſed and looked like a private man, hardly maintaining, as the world calls it, the dignity of his character. He was not one that loved to have the preeminence, and he contended with nobody for prerogative and precedence. He uſed hoſpitality without grudging: no man's houſe was more open to his friends, and the eaſe and freedom with which they always found themſelves entertained, was peculiar to it. The poor had ſubſtantial relief at his door, and his neighbours and acquaintance a hearty does our author great honour, ſince, beſides his being a very bold and free Critick, there was hardly any ſubject with which he was more thoroughly acquainted.

[D] Only becauſe he was fitteſt for it.] What has been delivered in the text upon this ſubject is founded upon the authority, and expreſſed in the very words, of the Reverend Mr. Payne, a very competent and unſuſpected witneſs to the truth of the facts which he has preſerved, and which, but for his duty and gratitude, might have been loſt to poſterity. But notwithſtanding the circumſtances which relate to Biſhop Cumberland reſt upon his teſtimony ſolely, yet, as to his promotion in general, a certain Prelate, well acquainted with the politicks of thoſe times, has given us a large account, which it may be the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee. The Biſhop of Ely's (Dr. Turner's) Letters to St. Germains (9), ſays he, 'gave ſo fair an occaſion of filling thoſe Sees (whoſe 'Biſhops would not take the oaths) at this time, that 'the King reſolved to lay hold on it; and Tillotſon, 'with great uneaſineſs to himſelf, ſubmitted to the 'King's command: and ſoon after the See of York 'falling void, Dr. Sharp was promoted to it, ſo that 'thoſe two Sees were filled with the two beſt preachers 'that had ſat in them in our time; only Sharp did 'not know the world ſo well, and was not ſo ſteady 'as Tillotſon was. Dr. Patrick was advanced to 'Ely, Dr. More was made Biſhop of Norwich, Dr. 'Cumberland was made Biſhop of Peterborough, 'Dr. Fowler was made Biſhop of Glouceſter, Ironſide was promoted to Hereford, Grove to Chicheſter, and Hall to Briſtol, as Hough (the Preſident of Magdalen's) was the year before this made 'Biſhop of Oxford; ſo that in two years time the 'King had named fifteen Biſhops, and they were 'generally looked on as the learneſt, the wiſeſt, 'and the beſt men, that were in the Church. It 'was viſible, that in all theſe nominations, and the 'filling the inferior dignities that became void by 'their promotion, no ambition nor Court favour had 'appeared; men were not ſcrambling for preferment, nor uſing arts, or employing friends, to ſet 'them forward; on the contrary, men were ſought 'for, and brought out of their retirements, and moſt 'of them very much againſt their own inclinations. 'They were men both of moderate principles, and 'of calm tempers. This great promotion was ſuch 'a diſcovery of the King and Queen's deſigns, with 'relation to the Church, that it ſerved much to remove the jealouſies, that ſome other ſteps the King 'had made were beginning to raiſe in the Whigs, 'and very much ſoftened the ill humour that was 'ſpread among them.'

(9) Burnet's Hiſt. of his own times, vol. ii. p. 76.

welcome to his table, after the plentiful and plain manner in which he lived. Every thing in his houſe ſerved for friendly entertainment, nothing for luxury or pomp. His deſire was to make every body eaſy, and to do them good. He diſpenſed with a liberal hand to the neceſſities of others, though his contented mind made him require little for his own. His kindneſs to his relations and acquaintance that wanted it, the ſums he parted with to ſuch as were indigent, are deeds not proper to be proclaimed. Half ſuch ſums, diſtributed with oſtentation by thoſe who deſire to have glory of men, would have gained the fame of great liberality and generoſity. In theſe caſes he truly obſerved our Saviour's precepts, to do his alms in ſecret, and even not to let his left-hand know what his right-hand did. His ſpeeches to the Clergy at his viſitations, and his exhortations to the Catechumens before his confirmations, though they had not the embelliſhments of oratory, yet they were fervent expreſſions of the inward deſires of his ſoul to do what good he was able, and to excite others to be influenced by it; the pious breathings of a plain and good mind. On all occaſions he treated his Clergy with ſingular regard and indulgence. An expreſſion, that often came from him, was, I love always to make my Clergy eaſy. This was his rule on all applications made to him by them, and if he erred, it was always on this ſide. When the duties of his office required it, he never ſpared himſelf. To the laſt month of his life it was impoſſible to diſſuade him from undertaking fatigues, that every body about him feared were ſuperior to his ſtrength. He was inflexible to their intreaties, and his anſwer and reſolution was, I will do my duty as long as I can (y). He had acted by a maxim like this in his vigour. When his friends repreſented to him, that, by his ſtudies and labours, he would injure his health, his uſual reply was, A man had better wear out than ruſt out. The laſt time he viſited his Dioceſe, he was in the eighties year of his age: it was apprehended that he could not but ſuffer through the fatigues of it, though it pleaſed God he had no inconvenience from it. At his next triennial, when he was in the eighty-third year of his age, it was with the utmoſt difficulty that he could be diſſuaded from undertaking again the viſitation of his Dioceſe. To draw the Clergy nearer than the uſual decanal meetings, to make his viſitations eaſier to himſelf, was a thing he would not hear of. He would never take a burthen from his own ſhoulders to lay it on other peoples (z). Such were the public acts of this great Prelate, in the diſcharge of his duty as a Father of the Church. In reſpect to his temporal concerns, and his management of the revenue ariſing from his See, an account will be found in the notes [E]. His natural parts were not quick, but ſtrong and retentive. He was a perfect maſter of every ſubject he ſtudied. Every thing he read ſtaid with him. The ideas in many mens minds are too like the impreſſions made in ſoft wax; they never are diſtinct and clear, and are ſoon effaced: in his mind they were like impreſſions cut in ſteel: they took ſome time in

forming, but they were clear, distinct, and durable (a). The things he had chiefly studied were searches into the most antient times, Mathematics in all its parts, and the Scripture in its original languages: these were the great works of his life; but he had, by the bye, diverted into almost all other studies. He was thoroughly acquainted with all the branches of Philosophy; he had good judgment in Physic, knew every thing that was curious in Anatomy, had an intimacy with the Classics. Indeed he was a stranger to no part of learning, but every subject he had occasion to talk of he was as much a master of it, as if the direction of his studies had chiefly lain that way. He was thoroughly conversant in Scripture, and had laid up that treasure in his mind. No hard passage ever occurred, either occasionally or in reading, but he could readily give the meaning of it, and the several interpretations, without needing to consult his books (b). He sometimes had thoughts of writing an exposition of the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians. It was a misfortune to the world, that he wanted that spur so necessary to excite men to action, the desire of praise. It is believed, that if he had proceeded in this design, he would have set the doctrine of Justification in a light very different from that in which it has been hitherto considered by most Divines. But the great business of his life was the examination of SANCHONIATHO'S Phœnician History, about which the greatest men had been most mistaken, and in relation to which none had entered into so strict an examination as our learned Prelate thought it deserved (c). He spent many years in these speculations; for he began to write several years before the Revolution, and he continued improving his design down to 1702. It may be justly wondered, that, after taking so much pains, and carrying a work of such difficulty to so high a degree of perfection, he should never judge it expedient to publish it; for, though his Bookseller refused to print the first part, at a critical season, yet afterwards both might have seen the light; and for this the most probable reason that can be assigned is, that thorough dislike he had to controversy. His son-in-law however, the Reverend Mr. Payne, has done justice to his memory, and published that work, which, by all competent judges, has been received with the utmost esteem and respect (d) [F]. After he had once engaged his thoughts upon this subject, fresh matter was continually rising, for the distribution of which into a proper method, so as to render a very perplexed subject intelligible, he found himself under the necessity of undertaking a yet more extensive work than the former, in which he made some progress in the space of above twenty years, during which we are assured that it employed his thoughts. To this piece, when finished, he proposed to have given the title of Origines Antiquissimæ (e), which were transcribed in his life-time, and, by his direction, through the care of the same person, who, from a most laudable sense of duty and gratitude, published the other work. This treatise also is now likewise in print, and justifies, in every respect, all that we have said of this learned and venerable Prelate, upon the credit chiefly of the editor. This last piece is properly a supplement to the first,

(a) These facts are rendered highly probable, if not incontestably proved by his writings.

[F] With the utmost esteem and respect.] The title of this work at large will give the reader some notion of it's contents. It runs thus: 'SANCHONIATHO'S 'Phœnician History, translated from the first book of 'Eusebius de Preparatione Evangelica. With a Continuation of Sanchoniatho's History by Eratosthenes 'Cyrenensis Canon, which Dicæarchus connects with 'the first Olympiad. These authors are illustrated 'with many Historical and Chronological Remarks, 'proving them to contain a Series of Phœnician and 'Egyptian Chronology, from the first man to the 'first Olympiad, agreeable to the Scripture accounts. By the Right Reverend R. Cumberland, 'D. D. late Bishop of Peterborough. With a Preface, giving a brief account of the Life, Character, 'and Writings, of the Author. By S. Payne, M. A. 'Rector of Barnack in Northamptonshire, his Lordship's domestick Chaplain (13).' Mr. Payne observes, that our author had a quicker sense than many other men of the advances Popery was making upon us, and was affected with the apprehension of it to the last degree. This made him turn his thoughts to the enquiry, by what steps and methods idolatry got ground in the world. The oldest account of this he believed he found in Sanchoniatho's fragment. This he saw was a professed apology for idolatry, and owned openly what other Heathens would have made a secret of, that the gods of the Gentile world had been all mortal men. He studied this fragment with no other view, than as it led to the discovery of the original of idolatry. He spent some time upon it, before ever he had a thought of extracting from it footsteps of the history of the world preceding the flood. While other Divines of the Church of England were engaged in the controversy with the Papists, in which they gained over them so compleat a victory, our author was endeavouring to strike at the root of their idolatrous religion (14). Such are the sentiments of this gentleman concerning our Prelate's work, which is in truth full of the most abstruse learning, and shews a sagacity and penetration equally singular and admirable. These fragments have exercised the talents of some of the ablest scholars that foreign nations have produced, and several of these, being able to make nothing clear or consistent out of them, incline to think they were forgeries, and consequently not worthy of notice. Our Prelate was not only of a different sentiment, but, with great knowledge and great labour, has made it very evident that these fragments are genuine, and that he thoroughly understood them. He has proved, that they contain the most antient system of atheism and idolatry, that very system which took place in Egypt, and was set up against the true religion contained in the writings of Moses. It cannot be expected that we should, in the compass of a note, enter into the plan of so large and so compact a performance, for our author was not a diffuse writer, but expressed himself clearly in few words, and has brought into a very narrow compass, what an author, covetous of fame, would have extended into a very large volume. But this great man aimed only at truth, and though the discovery of it cost him much time and pains, yet he was willing to conduct his reader to it by the shortest road possible. He saw indeed, that many useful deductions might be made from this discovery, and it was this that put him upon composing a second volume, of which we shall speak in the next note.

and equally valuable in every reſpect [G]. We have now done with his Hiſtory as a Father of the Church, and an ornament of the Republic of Letters: we will conclude with ſome account of his private life and diſpoſition when in the decline of his days, a ſeaſon in which the weakneſſes even of the greateſt men are frequent and excuſable. In him, however, there was no need of any apology of this ſort. His Lordſhip lived beyond what Horace called old age; but never were characters more unſuitable to any man, than thoſe beſtowed by that Poet on old men were to him: it is literally true, that he was, in every reſpect, the very reverſe of them. A perſon, who would have retired from every thing that was cenſorious, querulous, uneaſy, or diſquieting, muſt have gone into his company, and the room where he ſat. The eaſineſs and ſweetneſs of his temper were ſuch as is not to be deſcribed by words: nothing but converſation with him, and the experience of it, could give a man a juſt idea of it. This happy diſpoſition was become a habit to him, and continued to the laſt day of his life. His ſenſes and bodily ſtrength laſted better than could well be expected, in a man whoſe courſe of life had been ſtudious and ſedentary. Yet I, who converſed every day with him, ſays Mr. Payne, thought that the faculties of his mind were leſs impaired than thoſe of his body (f). He remained a maſter of all the parts of learning he had ſtudied when he was young. He ever loved the Claſſics, and, to the laſt week of his life, would quote them readily and appoſitely. When Dr. Wilkins had publiſhed his Coptic Teſtament, he made a preſent of one of them to his Lordſhip, who ſat down to ſtudy this when he was paſt eighty three. At this age he maſtered the language, and went through great part of this verſion, and would often give excellent hints and remarks as he proceeded in reading it. At length, in the autumn of the year 1718, he was ſtruck in an afternoon with a dead palſey, from which he could not be recovered (g). He had no previous notice of this at all, for he roſe in the morning rather better, and more vigorous, than uſual. He breathed his laſt in his Palace at Peterborough on the ninth of October, in the ſame year, in the eighty-ſeventh year of his age. His corps was interred in his own Cathedral, where a plain tomb has been erected, with a modeſt inſcription, to his memory (h) [H]. The turn of his ſtudies did not at

at all conduce to make our Prelate eminent in his life-time. There were a great variety of books written againſt Hobbes; but, amongſt this crowd of refuters, each of their books was not conſidered as a refutation. On the contrary, Hobbes maintained his notions very well againſt moſt of them, not through the juſtice of his cauſe, or the ſuperiority of his underſtanding, but becauſe he underſtood his ground perfectly well, and, like a ſkilful fencer, kept that advantage, and made the moſt of it. But our author was not to be ſo treated: he conſidered the ground well before he engaged, diſcerned his antagoniſt's advantage, and drove him from it; but as this was a hard and laborious taſk to himſelf, ſo his method of arguing was not to be underſtood but by cloſe application in his readers, ſo that it was a long while before the merit of his performance was fully known (i). At preſent, indeed, his reputation is very great at home, and much greater abroad; for foreign writers, of all nations, have been very ready to do him juſtice, and to ſpeak of him with the praiſes he deſerves [I].

[I] With the praiſes he deſerves.] We find the Life of our Prelate very exactly written from his ſon-in-law Mr. Payne's Memoirs, by Father Niceron (17), who commends highly his book againſt Hobbes. The learned Morhoff mentions that work of his twice (18), and tells us, that in his judgment it was written with great labour and no leſs diligence; and obſerves farther, that he goes to the bottom in detecting the falſe reaſoning of Mr. Hobbes. Another German author, who has written expreſsly upon the ſame ſubject, gives a great character of our author's book (19); and the learned Stollius gives likewiſe a fair character, and a very good account, of our author and his writings (20). His ſentiments, with regard to Sanchoniatho's Hiſtory, are greatly applauded by a gentleman (21) who had ſtudied theſe matters with much care, and who, it is very certain, was far enough from being diſpoſed to commend others without reaſon. It does not appear, that hitherto his Poſthumous Works have been tranſlated into Latin, or into any modern language. Whenever that ſhall happen, the fame of Dr. Cumberland will extend much farther than it has done hitherto; for whether his particular opinions be approved or not, it is impoſſible that his extenſive learning, his profound ſagacity, and his perfect acquaintance with the beſt authors of antiquity, ſhould not procure him juſt reverence and eſteem.  [CUNNINGHAM (ALEXANDER), Author of a Hiſtory of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the Acceſſion of King George I. was a native of Scotland; but we have not been able to aſcertain either the time or place of his birth. It appears, however, that his father was miniſter of the pariſh of Ettrick, in the preſbytery of Selkirk (a). He is ſaid to have received part of his education in Holland; and he paſſed ſome of the earlier years of his life as a travelling governor. He was a friend to the principles of the Revolution; was much with the Scottiſh refugees at the Hague previouſly to that event; and it has been conjectured, that he was in Holland in 1688, and that he even embarked on board the fleet with the Prince of Orange; but of this there is not ſufficient evidence. He travelled with James, afterwards Earl of Hyndford, and with the Hon. Mr. William Carmichael, father of the preſent Earl, who was younger brother to that Nobleman. They paſſed two winters at Utrecht and Franeker, between the years 1692 and 1695, and travelled together for ſome time afterwards (b). Mr. Cunningham was alſo much connected with the family of Archibald, Earl of Argyle: he appears to have had a conſiderable ſhare in the education of that Nobleman's ſon, Lord Lorne, afterwards well known under the name of John Duke of Argyle (c); and he afterwards travelled with him abroad [A]. In 1701, he was in France, and was employed in ſome negociations relative

[A] Travelled with him abroad.] In a letter from the Earl of Argyle to Mr. Carſtares, dated Edinburgh, July 10, 1697, and publiſhed in that Gentleman's State Papers, is the following paſſage: 'I 'have writ to Mr. Cunningham to lay aſide any 'thoughts he had for ſome time yet of leaving my 'ſon (1).' And in a letter of Mr. Cunningham's to Mr. Carſtares, printed in the ſame collection, dated Bruges, Oct. 20, 1697, Mr. Cunningham ſays, 'I do not yet know whether I ſhall go to Paris, 'or not, before I return to London. My Lord 'Argyle has not yet written any thing concerning 'his ſon. He was gone from this place to his regi-'ment before I came here, which I am glad of; for 'I know his lieutenant-colonel will take care of him. 'He is mightily concerned for his regiment: every 'body tells him it will be broken. I have aſſured 'him, that you will do your utmoſt for him. I muſt 'preſume to give you the trouble to carry over a few 'books of mine, which I have ordered to be ſent to 'your brother's. You will be pleaſed to paſs them 'as your own, elſe the cuſtom would amount to the 'fourth part they are worth; but am confident that 'what books any of the King's Chaplains takes over 'will be free; becauſe it may be ſaid that they are 'the books he carried abroad with himſelf for his 'own uſe.'—'As for the project, I know you will 'not only uſe all your credit with Secretary Ogilvy, 'but will alſo recommend the thing to all the Scots 'Nobility and Gentry you ſhall meet with at London (2).' At the time when Mr. Cunningham wrote this letter, Lord Lorne was Colonel of a regiment, which his father, the Earl of Argyle, had raiſed, and which was ſent over for the King's ſervice relative to the Scottiſh trade with that kingdom [B]. About this time he appears alſo to have had the care of ſome other perſon of rank, whom he carried with him into Italy (d).

In 1703, he was at Hanover, in company with Mr. Addiſon [C]; and returned to England in that year (e). By this time he appears to have formed ſome important political connexions; for, after his arrival in England, the ſame year, we find him, through the intervention of Dr. Moore, then Biſhop of Norwich, engaged in a ſecret negociation for the purpoſe of reconciling Lord Somers and Mr. Harley; in which he ſucceeded, at leaſt for a time; the reconciliation between theſe ſtateſmen being perfected, as he informs us, at the houſe of Lord Halifax (f). About this time alſo he was conſulted at London concerning the appointment of a new miniſtry for Scotland. He recommended the Duke of Argyle, and the Earl of Roxburgh; but if their youth were conſidered as an objection to theſe Noblemen, he pointed out, as the fitteſt miniſter for that kingdom, next to them, the Marquis of Tweedale (g). In 1704, he was ſo much in the confidence of the Engliſh miniſtry, as to be conſulted by them, at London, whether the royal aſſent ſhould be given to the Scotch Act of Security (h). It appears that he was ſtill in London in the following year, from a paſſage which occurs in his Hiſtory, wherein he mentions his having had a converſation with Sir Iſaac Newton about attacking Toulon [D], two years before the attack, which was made in 1707 (i).

In 1706, Mr. Cunningham appears to have gone abroad again; and it is ſuppoſed, that during that year he was in Holland, and that the following year he travelled into Italy (k). But before the cloſe of the year 1707, he was again in London, and took a very active part in promoting the Bill for the abolition of the Scotch Privy-council [E]; as he did alſo the following year in ſupport of a Bill relative to collegiate and cathedral churches, and for ſubjecting deans and prebendaries to their dioceſans (l). He likewiſe exerted all his influence, that the Members of the Houſe of Commons, choſen for Scotland, ſhould be ſtrenuous aſſertors of the principles of the Revolution (m).

vice in Flanders. Lord Lorne was appointed to the command of this regiment in 1694, when he was not quite ſeventeen years of age. But Dr. Thomſon is miſtaken in ſaying, that Lord Lorne was not ſeventeen at the time when Mr. Cunningham wrote this letter. His Lordſhip was born in 1678.

The literary project referred to by Mr. Cunningham, in this letter (3), is ſuppoſed, by Dr. Thomſon, to have been an intended edition of the Pandects of Juſtinian. And 'if we ſuppoſe,' ſays that Gentleman, 'that the literary project to which Cunningham alludes, was an intended edition of Juſtinian's Pandects, obvious reaſons are not wanting why he ſhould collect books, and why he ſhould ſolicit the countenance and aid of the Scotch nation. The civil is the grand baſis of the Scotch law; and he might receive aſſiſtance from the advocates pecuniary fund, as well as from their famous library, which is one of the beſt in the world. And, in fact, it appears from the records of the faculty of advocates, that, in order to enable him to accompliſh this deſign, he was allowed from that fund an allowance of fifteen pounds a year, a ſum towards the cloſe of laſt century not inconſiderable (4).'

He is ſuppoſed alſo to have been employed at this time in procuring intelligence, for the Engliſh miniſtry, relative to the military preparations then making throughout France (6); but of this there appears not ſufficient evidence.

[C] In 1703, he was at Hanover, &c.] In his Hiſtory, ſpeaking of the Court of Hanover in that year, he ſays, 'Mr. Joſeph Addiſon alſo, and Mr. Alexander Cunningham, came thither, who, happening to have travelled through thoſe countries, as well as to have made themſelves well acquainted with all the ſecret Counſels in England, were as ſupercilioufly treated by the Germans, as they were graciouſly received by the Elector and the Princeſs Sophia (7).'

[D] A converſation with Sir Iſaac Newton about attacking Toulon.] The paſſage in his Hiſtory is as follows: 'I remember well, that the excellent Sir Iſaac Newton, who was no lover of war, had ſome diſcourſes with me about attacking Toulon, two years before the attempt was made upon it: but there appeared ſo many and ſo great difficulties to Alexander Cunningham, who knew the place and the roads about it, that he differed in opinion from Sir Iſaac, not only on account of the difficulties of the place itſelf, but alſo of the diſinclination of the reſt of the confederates, which he always ſuſpected in relation to that affair: foraſmuch as by this one action, all the maritime power of the Popiſh Princes would be loſt, and the whole dominion of the Mediterranean ſea thereupon would alſo fall into the hands of the Engliſh and Dutch; from which the Emperor Joſeph was as much averſe, as he was ambitious to gain the ſovereignty of Italy (8).'

(8) Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 103.

Dr. Thomſon remarks, that we find Mr. Cunningham, 'in another part of his Hiſtory, uniting his advice with that of Mr. Iſaac Newton, relating to the coin of Great Britain; and that, on ſundry occaſions, he mentions the perſon, genius, and diſcoveries of Newton, with diſtinguiſhed reſpect and admiration: an honour the greater to our author, that Sir Iſaac had not, at that time, attained to the unrivalled celebrity which his name has ſince juſtly obtained in the world (9).'

[E] Promoting the Bill for the Abolition of the Scotch Privy Council.] He ſays in his Hiſtory, that, "from his youth, he had borne a juſt hate againſt "the Privy Council of Scotland (10)," which he repreſents as extremely arbitrary. In his account of the debates in parliament on this ſubject, he ſays, that Mr. George Baillie 'elegantly and briefly expoſed the immoderate power of the Privy Council in former times, the rigorous exerciſe of their authority, and what dreadful examples they had exhibited of all ſorts of cruelty.' He afterwards adds, that 'the courtiers, who were for protracting the time, made many and great delays, and propoſed expedients, but to no purpoſe; for Sir Godfrey Copley, Sir Peter King, and Sir Joſeph Jekyl, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Wortley, Mr. Aiſlabie, and others of both parties, celebrated for their eloquence in parliament, inſiſted ſtrenuouſly, that now a Privy Council could be of no other uſe in Scotland, than that the Court might thereby govern every thing at pleaſure, and by their own direction procure whomſoever they thought fit to be returned to ſerve in parliament; againſt which it was the common intereſt, both of the Scots and Engliſh, now united into one people, carefully to guard (11).'

When a new miniſtry was about to be formed, and the Tories began to acquire an aſcendancy, Mr. Cunningham again went abroad [F]; and in October, 1711, he was at Milan, in company with Richard Lord Lonſdale, with whom he was introduced to the Emperor Charles VI. [G] then in that city, and juſt raiſed to the imperial throne. He appears

[F] Mr. Cunningham again went abroad.] Before he quitted the kingdom, he appears to have had a conference with Mr. Harley, of which he has related the following particulars in his Hiſtory: 'At this 'time a certain private Gentleman of the Whig 'party (by which he is underſtood to mean himſelf), 'but who had long kept an acquaintance with Mr. 'Harley, ſeeing a cloud gathering over his country, 'reſolved to travel abroad. Before he ſet out, Mr. 'Harley deſired a conference with him, and invited 'him to dine with him alone. Many things were 'freely diſcourſed of, according to their wonted 'familiarity and long acquaintance, concerning the 'inclinations of the people, and the perverſe diſ-'poſition of the allies; and the other ſhewed Mr. 'Harley, how hard and difficult a taſk he had un-'dertaken. But they both perſiſted in their own 'opinions. After Mr. Harley had entreated him to 'ſtay here, the Gentleman ſaid, Tell me, I pray, 'Sir, is the parliament to be diſſolved? for this was 'very much ſuſpected; but Mr. Harley was not 'willing to anſwer him. Then, ſaid the Gentle-'man, When you tell me that, I ſhall eaſily grant 'all you can ſay of the happy times to come: but 'conſider well that ſaying of Virgil,

'Fertur equis auriga, nec audit currus habenas (12).'

(12) Hiſt. vol. ii. p. 303, 304.

Mr. Cunningham ſays in another place, 'Mr. 'Harley, to whom it was natural to give fair words 'to every body, gained upon many people by his 'addreſs, who were far from being of his ſentiments '(13).' And he alſo ſays, 'Mr. Harley judged it 'moſt prudent to proceed with moderation: and it 'is ſaid he perſuaded his friends, and the Queen 'herſelf, to diſſemble many things concerning the 'Pretender, on account of the Duke of Marl-'borough's forces, and his extraordinary power both 'at home and abroad. He was alſo afraid of the 'authority and inconſtancy of the parliament. The 'Tories therefore reſolved, that the preſent parlia-'ment ſhould be diſſolved, and another called. Mr. 'Harley, who had formed this whole ſcheme, gave 'many inſtructions to divers men of different parties, 'how to reconcile the minds of the people to him, 'and to render them ſubſervient to his meaſures. 'Many were inquiſitive to know his deſign. Nay, 'ſome ſaid, he either had no deſign at all, or elſe 'that it was moſt artfully concealed, leſt by the 'diſſent of any one, the whole combination ſhould 'be broken. Thoſe who ſuppoſed they knew him 'thoroughly, own that he was averſe to the Pre-'tender: but, if we may judge of him by his ac-'tions, men of all parties agreed in concluding, 'that his deſigns were in his favour. And it is cer-'tain, that he affected to have it thought ſo '(14).'

Of the calling a new parliament, and the uſe made of Sacheverell, and his reception in the country, Mr. Cunningham gives the following account: 'When 'the proclamation was iſſued for a new parliament, 'all England was in an uproar; and ſo enflamed by 'the churchmen, that their fury was to determine 'of the Members for the Houſe of Commons, and 'their elections, without any regard to the rights of 'the electors. For the canvaſſings and elections were 'carried on with ſuch feuds, as had never before 'been known in England. In many places they 'were carried by open violence. That firebrand of 'ſedition, Dr. Sacheverell, employed his whole time 'and pains to this purpoſe. Religion was therefore 'looked upon as the only popular cauſe; in the 'ſupport of which all the furies were raiſed to pro-'cure votes, and ran together, as it were, to the 'funeral of the government and the public liberty.'— 'Dr. Sacheverell, making a progreſs around the 'country, was looked upon as another Hercules for 'the church militant. Wherever he went, his emiſ-'ſaries were ſent before with his pictures; pompous 'entertainments were made for him, and a mixed 'multitude of country ſingers, fiddlers, prieſts and 'ſextons, and a mob of all conditions, male and 'female, crowded together to meet and congratulate 'him; among whom, drunkenneſs, darkneſs, and 'a furious zeal for religion, extinguiſhed all regard 'to modeſty. When this gueſt drew near with his 'guards, he found open houſes, lodging and enter-'tainment ready provided for him, in many country 'towns, as if he had been a demi-god: and days 'and nights were ſpent every where in ſhews, and 'the clamorous noiſe of thoſe religious furies. In 'order to gain the more upon the minds of the mul-'titude, wine, and the pleaſures of banquetting, 'were conſecrated, as it were, to religious uſes: 'whence aroſe ſuch a contagion of evils, that, in the 'country elections, ſome matters were carried on by 'deceit, and many by open force. For money was 'publickly beſtowed, and free treats, more than 'uſual, given to the voters. In many places, the 'Doctor's pictures paſſed for ready money; but in a 'ſhort time they became of little value. For, when 'they ceaſed to be a novelty, people began to de-'ſpiſe them; and the Doctor himſelf, as an enemy 'to the government, and a contemptible tool of a 'party, was either rudely treated, or utterly refuſed 'admittance, in many places and companies. When 'he was coming towards Ely, the people there were 'ſo provoked, that they threatened to do him a 'miſchief. And in many places they purſued him, 'both with violent hands, and with curſes. This 'ſo alarmed him, that he ſuddenly turned ſhort, and 'more deſirous of money than the honour of martyr-'dom, made the beſt of his way to London; and 'his pictures, which were of late ſo highly prized, 'and pompouſly handed about, were now contemp-'tuouſly applied to the baſeſt uſes, and paſted upon 'band-boxes (15).'

[G] He was introduced to the Emperor Charles VI.] The allies had been for ſome time labouring to eſtabliſh this Prince on the throne of Spain, and he had accordingly been proclaimed King at Madrid; but he was afterwards obliged to relinquiſh the Spaniſh Crown. When Mr. Cunningham was at Milan, many Princes, Ambaſſadors, and perſons of rank, came there to congratulate the new Emperor on his acceſſion to the imperial throne; but it was at this time that ſuſpicions firſt began to be entertained, that the Engliſh miniſtry were about to abandon the allies. Mr. Cunningham, in his Hiſtory, after obſerving, that "all Italy crowded to" Milan, to congratulate the Emperor on his acceſſion, ſays, 'The Duke of 'Savoy went to meet him, as did alſo the Dukes of 'Parma and Modena. Theſe, and many other 'Princes, ſent their Ambaſſadors to compliment 'him as Emperor. The great Duke of Tuſcany's 'younger ſon came to ſalute him. The republics of 'Venice and Lucca ſent a ſplendid embaſſy. And 'the Pope himſelf ſent Cardinal Imperiali, a man 'of great celebrity, and highly acceptable to him, 'as his legate à latere.'—'Amidſt this great con-'courſe of all the Italian and German Princes and 'Ambaſſadors, Richard Lord Viſcount Lonſdale, 'and Mr. Alexander Cunningham, his fellow travel-'ler, who were the only men of the Britiſh nation 'at that time in thoſe parts, came to Milan. And 'as they were no ſtrangers to what was then privately 'tranſacted in England, they immediately deſired 'to be admitted to pay their duty to his Majeſty, 'which was granted. His Majeſty gave them a 'gracious audience. For he was well aſſured of the 'fidelity and zeal which both of them had for his 'ſervice, and how much they abhorred all thoughts 'of having any concern in the baſe meaſures which 'were then carrying on in England. His Majeſty 'ſpake much in commendation of the civility of the appears to have continued abroad the following year, and at Venice met with the Duke of Argyle [H], with whom he ſpent a week in that city. When he returned to England, we do not find, nor are any farther particulars related of him during this reign; but in the reign of King George I. he was appointed miniſter from the Court of Great Britain to the republic of Venice. He arrived in that city in 1715, and continued there, in the character of reſident, till the year 1720, when he returned again to London. He lived many years after, which he ſeems chiefly to have paſſed in a ſtudious retirement. In 1735, he was viſited in London by Lord Hyndford, by the direction of his Lordſhip's father, to whom he had been tutor, when he appeared to be very old (n). He ſeems to have lived about two years after; for the body of an Alexander Cunningham lies interred

' private ſubjects in England, and of the good offices ' done to him there; but ſaid not a word of the ' Queen or her Counſels. And in this, indeed, he ' ſhewed his great wiſdom, as they were only private ' perſons, and far from having any ſhare either in ' her Majeſty's Counſels, or in the adminiſtration of ' the public affairs. He alſo commanded his Mi- ' niſters to entertain them with the utmoſt civility ' and reſpect, and to furniſh them with all ſorts of ' accommodation. Though they were not in want ' of any thing, yet they were invited to many enter- ' tainments. Being invited to ſup that night with ' Count Wratiſlaw, as they were coming to ſupper, ' they were overwhelmed, as it were with a ſudden ' tempeſt, by the news brought by an expreſs from ' Count Gallas, that the cauſe of the confederates ' was betrayed in England. On this they were ſo ' ſtruck with aſtoniſhment, that they crowded about ' the two Engliſhmen in the Palace, aſking them ' queſtions; but all to no purpoſe.

' The young Lord Lonſdale, alarmed at the novelty ' of his ſituation, and the tumult of the Germans, ' whiſpered to Cunningham, that it would be pru- ' dent for them to withdraw from the Palace. But ' Cunningham refuſed to do this, and diſſembling ' his fear, inquired, What was the matter? The ' Germans told them every thing: that the Queen ' had entered into a treaty with the French King; ' that the confederates were betrayed; and that ' Count Gallas was ordered to leave England in two ' days, and was now actually come over to Holland. ' To this Cunningham replied, " Theſe are ſtrange " times! This is ſtrange news! I have been afraid, " indeed, ever ſince the beginning of this confede- " rate war, and eſpecially within the two laſt years, " of ſome unhappy effects of a female government: " I therefore reſolved voluntarily to travel abroad, " rather than to ſtay at home to be a ſpectator of " ſuch things; even now to bear a ſhare with you " in your injuries, than to have any thing to do with " thoſe works of iniquity. Do not think that the " Engliſh nation are ſo ſtupid; as after ſo many " victories obtained, when the prize is now juſt ready " to fall into their hands, to ſuffer it to eſcape " them. Ye tell me ye are betrayed: but it is in- " credible. Do but look back upon the fidelity of " the Engliſh, of which ye have had ſo much ex- " perience hitherto; and then ye will rather confide " in them ſtill, than ſuſpect them to be capable of " deceiving you now." He added, a great ' many ' other arguments and words of courſe, that both ' himſelf and fellow-traveller might the more readily ' eſcape the frowns of the Germans.'

' In the mean time, Count Wratiſlaw conducted ' them to ſupper. There the Germans again aſked ' many queſtions about the Queen, and about her ' Miniſters. Cunningham confeſſed, that the loſs ' of reputation and credit was greater than could be ' imagined, and made ſuch other anſwers as he ' thought proper: but he laid the chief blame upon ' the clergy, whoſe blindneſs and influence in the ' parliament was at that time incredibly great; and ' deſired them not to be too haſty to give credit to ' any reports, till they ſhould firſt ſee how theſe ' things would end.

' After ſupper, the two Engliſhmen returned to ' their own apartments. Soon after this the Earl of ' Peterborough arrived ſuddenly in that city, and ' received the compliments of Count Wratiſlaw, and ' others of his Majeſty's Miniſters, the ſame night. ' They inquired of him, What was the reaſon of the ' change of meaſures in England? Which of the ' confederates had offended the Queen? And why ' her Majeſty would now give up her allies as a ' ſacrifice, and betray their glorious cauſe to the ' common enemy? The Earl of Peterborough, with ' great promptitude and preſence of mind, invented ' ingenious apologies, and made ſuch anſwers as he ' thought fit, without much inward concern, how- ' ever, at that alteration of affairs, which gave them ' ſo much uneaſineſs and diſpleaſure.

The next day the Lord Viſcount Lonſdale and ' Mr. Cunningham took an opportunity to viſit his ' Lordſhip, and to congratulate him on his arrival. ' After their mutual compliments, the Earl of Peter- ' borough ſaid, " What is the matter here? I per- " ceive his Majeſty's Miniſters to be full of uneaſi- " neſs. I had ſcarcely come into town before they " fell upon me, and teazed me with a thouſand " queſtions; ſo that I had neither a wink of ſleep " laſt night, nor any reſt this morning. Tell me, " therefore, I pray you, what is the meaning of it?" ' Mr. Cunningham made him this anſwer: " It is " very well for us that your Lordſhip is come. It " is impoſſible to relate what we went through the " laſt night. But as your Lordſhip is acquainted " with all her Majeſty's Counſels, you muſt needs " know every thing that is doing in England: and " ſince you are able to anſwer all their queſtions, " and to ſatisfy all their deſires, be pleaſed, my " Lord, to impart that ſatisfaction, which they de- " ſire ſo eagerly, to us. They tell us here very " ſtrange things; that the Queen is ſecretly treat- " ing with the French King about a peace; and " that Count Gallas, the Ambaſſador, was ordered " to depart the kingdom; and what not. That any " unjuſtifiable meaſures are carrying on in England, " is a ſad thing to be reported, and moſt afflicting to " us to hear. If this be true, you muſt know it; " and for my part, if they aſk me any more queſ- " tions about it, I ſhall refer them to your Lordſhip."

' The Earl of Peterborough replied, " I have a " very weighty affair to negociate here; not leſs " than twenty thouſand pounds payable to me by " King Charles." " That is, indeed," ſays ' the ' other, " a weighty affair. Your Lordſhip muſt, " therefore, ſuit yourſelf to their humour, diſſemble " your own ſentiments of the peace, and conſult the " glory and welfare of our nation, as you would " have others conſult your own intereſt." He ' alſo added many other things concerning the diſ- ' honour this peace would reflect upon England; ' concluding with a wiſh, that the Queen would ' continue this one year firm to her alliance with the ' new Emperor, and once more try his fortune in ' the field (16).'

[H] At Venice met with the Duke of Argyle.] He ſays in his Hiſtory, ' In thoſe gloomy times, the ' Duke of Argyle, returning from Spain, though ' not yet perfectly recovered of his tertian ague, ' came to Venice. There he was met by Mr. ' Alexander Cunningham, whom, on account of old ' acquaintance, the Duke honoured with great ' friendſhip and familiarity for a whole week. They ' laid aſide all party diſputes, and converſed at great ' length with perfect freedom. The Duke of Argyle ' expreſſed his ſenſe of the dangers to which the ' intereſts of Great Britain, and the common ſafety ' of the confederates, were expoſed; and declared ' his reſolution, as ſoon as he could poſſibly return ' to England, to oppoſe the miniſtry, and the peace, ' and to join the Whigs (17).'

His "Hiſtory of Great Britain, from the Revolution in 1688, to the acceſſion of "George the Firſt," was publiſhed in two volumes, 4to. in 1787. It was written by Mr. Cunningham in Latin, but was tranſlated into Engliſh by the Rev. William Thomſon, L. L. D. The original manuſcript came into the poſſeſſion of the Rev. Dr. Hollingbery, Archdeacon of Chicheſter, ſome of whoſe relations had been connected with the author. He communicated it to the Earl of Hardwicke, and to the Rev. Dr. Douglas, now Biſhop of Carliſle, both of whom recommended the publication. In a ſhort preface to the work, the Archdeacon ſays, "My firſt deſign was to have produced it in the original; but "knowing how few are ſufficiently learned to underſtand, and how many are indiſpoſed "to read two quarto volumes in Latin, however intereſting and entertaining the ſubject "may be, I altered my purpoſe, and intended to have ſent it into the world in a tranſla-"tion. A nervous fever depriving me of the power, defeated the ſcheme." But he afterwards transferred the undertaking to Dr. Thomſon; and Dr. Hollingbery obſerves, that Dr. Thomſon "has expreſſed the ſenſe of the author with fidelity." The work was undoubtedly well deſerving of publication. It contains the hiſtory of a very intereſting period, written by a man who had a conſiderable degree of authentic information, and his book contains many curious particulars not to be found in other hiſtories. His characters are often drawn with judgment and impartiality: at other times they are ſomewhat tinctured with prejudice. This is particularly the caſe with reſpect to Biſhop Burnet, againſt whom he appears to have conceived a ſtrong perſonal diſlike. But he was manifeſtly a very attentive obſerver of the tranſactions of his own time; his work contains many juſt political remarks; and the facts which he relates are exhibited with great perſpicuity, and often with much animation. Throughout his book he frequently interſperſes ſome account of the literature, and of the moſt eminent perſons of the age concerning which he writes; and he has alſo adorned his work with many alluſions to the claſſics, and to antient hiſtory.

Alexander Cunningham, the author of the Hiſtory of Great Britain, has been ſuppoſed to be the ſame perſon with Alexander Cunningham, who publiſhed an edition of Horace at the Hague, in two volumes, 8vo. in 1721, which is highly eſteemed. But, from the beſt information we have been able to collect, they were certainly different perſons; though they were both of the ſame name, lived at the ſame time, had both been travelling tutors, were both ſaid to have been eminent for their ſkill at the game of cheſs [I], and both lived to a very advanced age. The editor of Horace is generally ſaid to have died in Holland, where he taught both the civil and canon laws (p), and where he had collected a very large library, which was ſold in that country.] T.

[I] Eminent for their ſkill at the game of cheſs.] The editor of Horace was very particularly celebrated for his ſkill as a cheſs-player; and of one of the Cunninghams the following ſtory is related. 'When 'Lord Sunderland was at the Hague, he contracted 'a particular intimacy with Mr. Cunningham, as 'they were both remarkable cheſs-players. Whenever his Lordſhip was at leiſure, he either drove to 'Cunningham's lodgings, which were at ſome diſtance, or ſent his carriage for him. After playing for a courſe of time, Lord Sunderland diſcovered, that he who was jolted in the carriage 'before they ſat down, was always ſure to loſe every 'game: for which reaſon, he gave over going to 'Cunningham's, but always ſent for him, and always beat him, to his no ſmall aſtoniſhment, as 'he was conſcious that he underſtood the game as 'well as his adverſary. At laſt, when he was very 'much out of humour, Lord Sunderland told him 'the trick, and Cunningham inſiſted, that they 'ſhould drive to one another's lodging alternately; 'which confirmed his Lordſhip's obſervation, and 'reſtored Cunningham to his former level: for, 'from that time, they won and loſt alternately '(18).'—"This fact," ſays Dr. Thomſon, "which "appears not at all incredible, for the ſtreets of the "Hague were not, in the laſt century, ſo ſmooth "as thoſe of London are at preſent, proves how "nicely the capacities of Sunderland and Cunning-"ham were balanced againſt each other: but it is "more curious and intereſting on another account; "it ſhews the intimate connection between our "corporeal frame and the faculty of thinking (19)." It ſeems to be the editor of Horace of which this ſtory is related; but which ever of the Cunninghams it was, the ſtory ſeems not ſufficiently authenticated to ground upon it much philoſophical reaſoning.]

 [CUTTS (John Lord), a ſoldier of moſt hardy bravery in King William's wars, was a younger ſon of Richard Cutts, Eſq (a); of an ancient and diſtinguiſhed family, ſettled about the time of Henry VI. at Matching in Eſſex, where they had conſiderable property. His father removed to Childerley in Cambridgeſhire, on a good eſtate being given him by Sir John Cutts, Bart. who died without iſſue. This eſtate, after the deceaſe of an elder brother, devolved on John; who ſold it, to pay incumbrances, to equip himſelf as a ſoldier, and to enable himſelf to travel (b). After an academical education at Cambridge, he entered early into the ſervice of the Duke of Monmouth, and followed his fortunes abroad; was Aid-de-Camp to the Duke of Lorrain in Hungary, and ſignalized himſelf in a very extraordinary manner at the taking of Buda by the Imperialiſts in 1686; which important place had been for nearly a century and a half in the hands of the Turks. Mr. Addiſon, in a Latin poem (c) worthy of the Auguſtan age, plainly hints at Mr. Cutts's diſtin-diſtinguiſhed bravery [A] at that ſiege. He was afterwards Colonel of a regiment in Holland under the States, and accompanied King William to England, who "being graciouſly pleaſed (d) to confer a mark of his royal favour upon Colonel John Cutts, for his faithful ſervices, and zealous affection to his royal perſon and government, thought fit to create him a Baron of the kingdom of Ireland, by the ſtyle and title of Baron Cutts of Gowran in the ſaid kingdom, December 6, 1690." He was appointed Governor of the Iſle of Wight, April 14, 1693; made a Major General; and, when the aſſaſſination-project was diſcovered, 1695-6, was Captain of the King's Guard. He was twice married; firſt, to Elizabeth (e), daughter of George Clark of London, Merchant, (relict of John Morley, of Glynd, in Suſſex, and after, of John Trevor, Eſq; eldeſt brother to the firſt Lord Trevor). This Lady died in Feb. 1692; and that ſame year he had both his legs hurt in the battle of Steenkirk (f). His ſecond wife, an amiable young woman, was educated under the care of her grandmother, the Lady Pickering [B], of Cambridgeſhire. She was brought to bed of a ſon, September 1, 1697, and died in a few days after, aged only 18 years and as many days. Her character has been admirably delineated by Biſhop Atterbury [C], who thus inſcribes a Sermon to her ſurviving Lord.

[B] Care of her grandmother, the Lady Pickering.] For an ingenious conjecture concerning Lady Pickering, ſee the Gentleman's Magazine, vol. liv. p. 120.

[C] Admirably delineated by Biſhop Atterbury.] The whole of this character is well worth tranſcribing, if our limits would allow it. The concluſion of it we cannot omit.

"Soon after her marriage, ſhe declared to ſeveral friends her thoughts, that every woman of quality was as much more obliged, as ſhe was more enabled than other women, to do good in the world; and that the ſhorteſt and ſureſt way of doing this was, to endeavour by all means to be as good a Chriſtian, and as good a wife, and as good a friend, as was poſſible.

"She endeavoured to be all this, and ſhe fell not far ſhort of it: for ſhe excelled in all the characters that belonged to her, and was in a great meaſure equal to all the obligations that ſhe lay under: ſhe was devout, without ſuperſtition; ſtrict, without ill-humour; good-natured, without weakneſs; chearful, without levity; regular, without affectation. She was to her huſband the beſt of wives, the moſt agreeable of companions, and moſt faithful of friends; to her ſervants, the beſt of miſtreſſes; to her relations, extremely reſpectful; to her inferiors, very obliging; and by all that knew her, either nearly or at a diſtance, ſhe was reckoned, and confeſſed to be, one of the beſt of women.

"And yet all this goodneſs, and all this excellence, was bounded within the compaſs of eighteen years, and as many days: for no longer was ſhe allowed to live among us. She was ſnatched out of the world as ſoon almoſt as ſhe made her appearance in it; like a jewel of high price, juſt ſhewn a little, and then put up again; and we were deprived of her by that time we had learnt to value her. But circles may be complete, though ſmall; the perfection of life doth not conſiſt in the length of it: if it did, our Saviour, to be ſure, would not have died ſo ſoon after thirty.

"Short as her life was, ſhe had time enough to adorn the ſeveral ſtates of virginity and marriage; and to experience the ſadneſs of a kind of widowhood too: for ſuch ſhe accounted it, when her Lord was long abſent from her, mourned as much, and refuſed as much to be comforted, till his return.

"As her life was ſhort, ſo her death was ſudden; ſhe was called away in haſte, and without any warning. One day ſhe drooped, and the next ſhe died: nor was there the diſtance of many hours between her being very eaſy in this world, and very happy in another.

"However, though ſhe was ſeized thus ſuddenly by death, yet ſhe was not ſurprized; for ſhe was ever in preparation for it; 'her loins girt' (as the Scripture ſpeaks), 'and her lamp ready trimmed, 'and burning.' The moment almoſt that ſhe was taken ill, ſhe was juſt riſen from her knees, and had made an end of her morning devotions. And to ſuch an one a ſudden death could be no misfortune. We pray indeed againſt it, becauſe few, very few, are fit for it; and the Church is to proportion her forms to the generality of Chriſtians: but where a good ſoul is in perfect readineſs, there the ſooner the fatal ſtroke is ſtruck the better; all delays in this caſe are uncomfortable to the dying, as well as to thoſe friends who ſurvive them.

"In truth, ſhe could not be called away more haſtily than ſhe was willing to go. She had been uſed ſo much to have 'her converſation in Heaven,' and her ſoul had been ſo often upon the wing thither, that it readily left its earthly ſtation upon the leaſt notice from above; and took the very firſt opportunity of quitting her body, without lingering, or expecting a ſecond ſummons. She ſtayed no longer after ſhe was called, than to aſſure her Lord of her entire reſignation to the Divine Will, and of her having no manner of uneaſineſs upon her mind; and to take her leave of him with all the expreſſions of tenderneſs. When this was over, ſhe had nothing more to do with her ſenſes; ſhe ſunk immediately under her illneſs, and, after a ſhort unquiet ſlumber, ſlept in peace.

"Thus lived, and thus died, this excellent Lady, whoſe character I have ſo far repreſented, as my time, and the meaſure of ſuch diſcourſes as theſe, would ſuffer me; and endeavoured to renew a faint image of her ſeveral virtues and perfections upon your minds. I have done it in a confuſed manner, and without the nice diviſions of art; for grief is not methodical: it is enough, if I have been able to ſet before you ſome reſemblance of her, though I ſhould not have done it after the beſt and livelieſt manner: when the life is gone, a picture, drawn even by an unſkilful hand, hath its uſe and value; and thoſe who loved what it doth (however unequally) repreſent, will be touched at the ſight of it (2)."

[D] That nothing leſs than your repeated commands could have excuſed me for publiſhing it] Two other Sermons were publiſhed on the ſame occaſion; one by John Provoſte, M. A. with an account of her moſt pious life and lamented death, and a dedication to Lord Cutts; the other, preached at Kenſington Church, Dec. 5, 1697, by W. Wigan, M. A. Vicar of Kenſington. Wigan and Atterbury were both at this time Chaplains in ordinary to his Majeſty. Atterbury's Sermon was probably alſo preached at Kenſington.

ſubject of it is death; a thing which you, my Lord, have very familiarly converſed with, and ſeen in all its ſhapes; but never, I believe, found it ſo truly terrible as in the face of my Lady. All that were about you were witneſſes with how ſenſible a concern you bore the loſs of her: and indeed it was ſuch a loſs, as even all your courage was but little enough to bear. I pray God, it may turn to account to your Lordſhip another way; and may furniſh you with ſuch reflections, and inſpire you with ſuch reſolutions, as, if well purſued, will make you amends for any loſs on this ſide Heaven. Your Lordſhip has choſen to expreſs ſome part of your grief this way, by giving the world an opportunity of grieving with you; which it will certainly do, wherever my Lady Cutts's character is truly known; and I have endeavoured to make it known in the following pages, with all the ſincerity that becomes my profeſſion; a quality which, I muſt own to your Lordſhip, I would not forfeit upon any account; no, not though I were ſure of doing the greateſt good by it. Some part of what is there written I know, and the reſt I do in my conſcience believe to be true, after a very ſtrict and particular enquiry. If I may be ſo happy, in what I have ſaid, as to contribute any ways towards fixing a true opinion of my Lady's merit, and ſpreading the intereſts of virtue and piety by the means of it, I have all the ends I propoſed to myſelf in this diſcourſe; beſide the honour of publiſhing to the world, that

In 1695, and the three following parliaments, Lord Cutts was regularly elected one of the repreſentatives both for the county of Cambridge, and for the borough of Newport in the Iſle of Wight; but made his election for the former. In two parliaments which followed (1702 and 1705) he repreſented Newport (b). In 1698 he was complimented by Mr. John Hopkins (i), as one to whom " a double crown was due," as a hero and as a poet. In 1699, he is thus introduced (k) in a compliment to King William on his conqueſts:

" My Lord, Tower Guard, March 23, 1701.

" The addreſs of the following papers is ſo very much due to your Lordſhip, that they are but a mere report of what has paſſed upon my guard to my Commander; for they were writ upon duty, when the mind was perfectly diſengaged, and at leiſure, in the ſilent watch of the night, to run over the buſy dream of the day; and the vigilance which obliges us to ſuppoſe an enemy always near us, has awakened a ſenſe that there is a reſtleſs and ſubtle one, which conſtantly attends our ſteps, and meditates our ruin.

" Thoughts of this nature a man may with freedom acknowledge to your Lordſhip, who have ever been ſo far from running into the faſhionable vice of exploding religion, that your early valour firſt appeared againſt the profeſſed enemies of Chriſtianity; and Buda had tranſmitted you to late poſterity, but that you yourſelf have obliterated your part in that glorious ſcene by the freſher memory of you at Limerick and Namur.

" With one honeſt purpoſe of life, and conſtant ſervice of one intereſt and one cauſe, in what country have you not fought? in what field have you not bled? But I know I here offend you, nor will you allow warmth in commendation to be like a friend; but if, my Lord, to ſpeak you generous, honeſt, and brave, be not friendly, I do aſſure you it is the only thing I will ever do in common with your enemies.

" I ſaid your enemies; but if there are any who have ignorance or malice enough to be ſuch, their little hates muſt be loſt in the diſtinction the better world allow you; and that county (3) (whoſe diſcerning is refined by a learned and elegant univerſity) has done you ſo great an honour in making you unanimouſly their repreſentative in parliament, that they who would oppoſe your reputation, do but confeſs they are unacquainted with what paſſes in the world, and ſtrangers to the reſidence of knowledge and virtue. It was there you received thoſe rudiments of honour, which have rendered your life conſpicuous enough to make you appear a worthy deſcendant of an ancient and diſtinguiſhed family, which has ſerved the Crown in the moſt eminent ſtations, and been equally favourites of their country. It was there you imbibed thoſe impreſſions which inſpire that true uſe of your being, which ſo juſtly divides your time between labour and diverſion, that the one does but recreate for the other, and which give a generous contempt of both when in competition with the ſervice of that country which you love, and that God whom you worſhip.

during the abſence of the Duke of Marlborough; Commander in Chief of the forces in Ireland, under the Duke of Ormond, March 23, 1704-5; and afterwards one of the Lords Juſtices of that kingdom, to keep him out of the way of action, a circumſtance which broke his heart. He died at Dublin, Jan. 26, 1706-7, and was buried there on the 29th, in the Cathedral of Chriſt-church (l). He was a perſon of eminent natural parts, well cultivated by ſtudy and converſation; of a free, unreſerved temper; and of undaunted bravery and reſolution. As he was a ſervant to Queen Mary when Princeſs of Orange, and learned the trade of war under her Conſort, he was early devoted to them both, and a warm ſupporter of the Revolution (m). He was an abſolute ſtranger to fear; and, on all occaſions, gave diſtinguiſhing proofs of his intrepidity, particularly at the ſiege of Limerick in 1691, at the memorable attack of the Caſtle of Namur in 1695, and at the ſiege of Venlo [F] in 1702. Macky (n) ſays of him, in 1703, "He hath abundance "of wit, but too much ſeized with vanity and ſelf-conceit; he is affable, familiar, and "very brave. Few conſiderable actions happened in this as well as the laſt war, in which "he was not, and hath been wounded in all the actions where he ſerved; is eſteemed to "be a mighty vigilant officer, and for putting the military orders in execution; he is "pretty tall, luſty, well-ſhaped, and an agreeable companion; hath great revenues, yet "ſo very expenſive, as always to be in debt; towards fifty years old." Swift, in a MS. note on the above paſſage, with his uſual laconic cruelty, calls Lord Cutts, "The vaineſt "old fool alive." "In the Netherlands, the Earl of Marlborough not being able to bring the French to an engagement, the Deputies of the States in the army repreſented to him, that it would be much to the advantage of Holland, to diſpoſſeſs the enemy of the places they held in the Spaniſh Guelderland, whereby the navigation of the Maeſe would be opened. And accordingly preparations were made for the ſiege of Venlo, which was inveſted the 29th of Auguſt, and on the 7th of September the trenches were opened. I ſhall not take upon me to give a diary of every ſiege during this long war, but there are ſome heroic actions that muſt not be paſſed by: ſuch was that performed by my Lord Cutts before this place. On the 18th of September his Lordſhip was commanded to attack Fort St. Michael, between the Baſtion that is next the plain, and the Ravelin that lies on the North ſide of it, having under his command Brigadier General Hamilton, with the Royal Regiment of Ireland, and General Hukelem's regiment, 172 Grenadiers, and 100 Fuſileers, moſt Engliſh, under a Lieutenant Colonel; as alſo 300 workmen, with a competent number of Engineers under Colonel Blood. His Lordſhip's orders were to make a lodgment from the point of the Ravelin to the Baſtion, leaving him at liberty to proceed farther if he found it practicable. And at the ſame time the Prince of Anhalt, with the ſame number of troops, was to make an attack between the Baſtion and the Ravelin on the North ſide, with the like diſcretionary orders, either to lodge himſelf, or to advance as he ſhould ſee occaſion. The ſignal for both attacks, which was to be the blowing up a tun of powder, and the diſcharge of all the batteries of the beſiegers, both cannon and mortars, was accordingly made a little before ſix in the evening. The Lord Cutts had given orders on this attack to the Officers that led the Grenadiers, firſt to clear the covered way of the enemy, and if they ſaw it practicable when that was done, to attack the Ravelin ſword in hand; aſſuring them, in the hearing of all the Grenadiers, that as ſoon as he ſaw fifty of the latter on the top of the Ravelin, he would ſacrifice himſelf and his troops rather than not ſuſtain them; and that therefore they might go on with undauntedneſs if they found it poſſible to paſs. His Lordſhip heightened their courage and alacrity by promiſing rewards in her Majeſty's name to all ſuch who ſhould ſignalize themſelves. His Lordſhip's orders were executed with inexpreſſible vigour and chearfulneſs; and as ſoon as the Grenadiers, whom his Lordſhip with diſtinguiſhed intrepidity and admirable preſence of mind ſuſtained with freſh numbers, had cleared the Counterſcarp with their fire, and avoided a Mine which was unſucceſsfully ſprung by the enemy, they boldly attacked the Ravelin with ſword in hand, encouraging and aſſiſting one another upon the aſſurance of being ſeconded; which the Lord Cutts perceiving, he marched with all his forces, engaged the enemy, and was ſoon maſter of the Ravelin. The French then made a great fire upon the Engliſh from the rampart of the Fort; whereupon the Lord Cutts ſent orders to the Officers that were at the head of the Grenadiers, to throw in their granadoes and attack the Fort ſword in hand, if it were poſſible to find a paſſage; which they did, by charging and following the enemy ſo cloſe, that they had not time to break the bridge, though it was hotly diſputed by fire and puſh of pike, and eſpecially by the enemy's Grenadiers from the flank of one of their Baſtions. But the bravery of the Engliſh Grenadiers, by the example of their Officers, and ſome Volunteers of diſtinction, (as the Earl of Huntington, my Lord Lorn, my Lord Marckar, the Prince D'Avergne, Sir Richard Temple, Colonel Webb, and Mr. Dalrymple,) was inexpreſſible: ſome of them attacked the bridge, and ſome clambered up the ramparts, after having thrown in their granadoes, and forced their way into the Fort. The enemy continued to defend themſelves, till the Engliſh poured in ſo faſt upon them, that they were no longer able to reſiſt; which as ſoon as the Lord Cutts perceived, he checked the fury of the ſoldiers, and put a ſtop to the ſlaughter. The Engliſh took above 200 priſoners, whereof 30 were Officers, with a Brigadier General and the Governor; but all the reſt that were in the Fort, to the number of 600 were killed or drowned, endeavouring to eſcape, except 12 who happily paſſed the Maeſe in ſmall boats.

"When the Lord Cutts found himſelf entirely in poſſeſſion of the Forts, having left 400 men in the outworks, he poſted a guard at the great Port towards the town, and a ſmall guard at each ſally Port, ſeized the Magazines, ſent out 100 Grenadiers to diſcover on the ſide of the Maeſe, if any of the enemy were there drawn up; the reſt of his troops upon the rampart, towards the town, turned the enemies cannon upon them, made a diſcharge to give notice to the camp that all was well, and continued under arms all night. Of the Engliſh in this action two Captains were wounded, two Lieutenants and one Enſign killed, and three wounded, one Serjeant killed, and three wounded, 130 men killed, and 132 wounded: And the Lord Cutts's Aid de Camp, Captain Bolas, with Mr. Eley, an Engliſh Volunteer, killed on the ſpot. The loſs of the Dutch was no leſs than that of the Engliſh.

"On the 25th of September the town of Venlo beat a parley, and the garriſon ſurrendered upon honourable terms, and were conducted to Antwerp (4)."

APPENDIX TO LETTER C. No. I.

VOL. III. Page 450.

 [CHATTERTON (THOMAS), a youth of a very extraordinary genius, was born of a family in no reſpect illuſtrious; but which is more nearly connected with ſome of the circumſtances of his literary hiſtory than that of moſt other votaries of the Muſes. It appears that the office of Sexton of St. Mary Redcliffe, in Briſtol, had continued in different branches of this family for more than one hundred and fifty years; and that John Chatterton, the laſt of the name who enjoyed that office, was elected in March 1725, and continued Sexton till his death, which happened in the year 1748 (a). Thomas Chatterton, the nephew of the preceding, and father to the extraordinary perſon who is the ſubject of theſe memoirs, had, we are informed, been in the early part of life in the ſtation of a writing uſher to a claſſical ſchool (b), was afterwards engaged as a ſinging man of the Cathedral of Briſtol, and latterly was Maſter of the Free School in Pyle-ſtreet in the ſame city (c). He died in Auguſt 1752, leaving his wife then pregnant of a ſon, who was born on the twentieth of November, and baptized the firſt of January following, by the name of THOMAS, at St. Mary Redcliffe, by the Rev. Mr. Gibbs, Vicar of that Church.

The life of Chatterton, though ſhort, was eventful: it commenced as it ended, in indigence and misfortune. By the premature loſs of his father he was deprived of that careful attention which would probably have conducted his early years through all the difficulties that circumſtances or diſpoſition might oppoſe to the attainment of knowledge; and by the unpromiſing aſpect of his infant faculties he was excluded a ſeminary, which might have afforded advantages ſuperior to thoſe he afterwards enjoyed. His father had been ſucceeded in the ſchool at Pyle-ſtreet by a Mr. Love, and to his care Chatterton was committed at the age of five years. But either his faculties were not yet opened, or the waywardneſs of genius, which will purſue only ſuch objects as are ſelf-approved, incapacitated him from receiving inſtruction in the ordinary methods; and he was remanded to his mother as a dull boy, and incapable of improvement (e). Nothing is more fallacious than the judgments which are formed during infancy of the future abilities of youth. Mrs. Chatterton was rendered extremely unhappy by the apparently tardy underſtanding of her ſon, till he fell in love, as ſhe expreſſed herſelf, with the illuminated capitals of an old muſical manuſcript, in French, which enabled her, by taking advantage of the momentary paſſion, to initiate him in the alphabet (f). She taught him afterwards to read from an old black-lettered Teſtament, or Bible (g). Perhaps the bent of moſt men's ſtudies may, in ſome meaſure, be determined by accident, and frequently in very early life; nor is it unreaſonable to ſuppoſe that his peculiar attachment to antiquities may, in a conſiderable degree, have reſulted from this little circumſtance.

We are not informed by what means or by what recommendation he gained admiſſion into Colſton's Charity-ſchool; but doubtleſs, in the ſituation of his mother at the time, it muſt have been a moſt deſirable event; however unſuitable ſuch a courſe of diſcipline might be to the improvement of Chatterton's peculiar talents. Moſt of thoſe prodigies of genius, who had hitherto aſtoniſhed mankind, by the early diſplay of abilities and learning, had been aided by the advantage of able inſtructors, or had at leaſt been left at liberty to purſue the impulſe of their ſuperior underſtandings. It was the lot of Chatterton to be confined to the mechanical drudgery of a charity-ſchool; and the little ordinary portions of leiſure, with which boys in his ſituation are indulged, was the only time allowed him to lay the foundation of that extenſive and abſtruſe erudition which decorated even his early years. This ſeminary, founded by Edward Colſton, Eſq; is ſituate at St. Auguſtine's Back in Briſtol, and is much upon the ſame plan with Chriſt's Hoſpital in London, (the only plan perhaps on which a charity-ſchool can be generally uſeful,) the boys being boarded in the houſe, clothed, and taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. Chatterton, at this period, wanted a few months of eight years of age, being admitted on the third of Auguſt 1760 (b). The rules of this inſtitution are ſtrict. The ſchool hours in ſummer are from ſeven o'clock till twelve in the morning, and from one till five in the afternoon; and in winter, from eight to twelve, and from one to four. The boys are obliged to be in bed every night in the year at eight o'clock, and are never permitted to be abſent from ſchool, except on Saturdays and Saints days, and then only from between one and two in the afternoon till between ſeven and eight in the evening. The detail of theſe apparently trivial particulars may at preſent ſavour of a culpable minuteneſs; but their importance will be experienced before I have concluded.

(b) On the authority of a letter ſigned G. B. dated Briſtol, Aug. 30, 1778, printed in the St. James's Chron. In Dr. Milles's Prelim. Diſſ. it is 1761; but this muſt be a miſprint, as all agree that he was between ſeven and eight years old when admitted.

The firſt years of his reſidence at this ſeminary paſſed without notice, and perhaps without effort. His ſiſter, indeed, in her letter to Mr. Croſt, remarks, that he very early diſcovered a thirſt for pre-eminence, and that even before he was five years old he was accuſtomed to preſide over his play-mates [A]. There is a curious letter from Mr. Thiſtlethwaite of Briſtol, publiſhed by Dr. Milles in his edition of Rowley's Poems, which contains many intereſting particulars concerning Chatterton. In the ſummer of 1763, Mr. Thiſtlethwaite, who was then very young, contracted an intimacy with one Thomas Philips [B], an Uſher or Aſſiſtant-maſter at Colſton's ſchool. Though the education of Philips had not been the moſt liberal, he yet poſſeſſed a taſte for hiſtory and poetry; and by his attempts in verſe, excited a degree of literary emulation among the elder boys. It is very remarkable, that Chatterton is ſaid to have appeared altogether as an idle ſpectator of theſe poetical conteſts: he ſimply contented himſelf with the ſports and paſtimes which appeared more immediately adapted to his age; he apparently poſſeſſed neither inclination nor ability for literary purſuits, nor does Mr. Thiſtlethwaite believe that he attempted a ſingle couplet during the firſt three years of his acquaintance with him (k). Whatever grounds Mr. Thiſtlethwaite might have for this opinion, it, however, only ſerves to furniſh an additional proof of the deceitfulneſs of thoſe conjectures which are formed concerning the abilities of youth. The pert and forward boy, of active, but ſuperficial talents, generally bears away the palm from the modeſty and penſiveneſs of genius. Such a diſpoſition, which is in reality the reſult of inſenſibility, too frequently meets with encouragement, which produces indolence, impudence, and diſſipation; while the leſs ſhewy, but more excellent underſtandings, are depreſſed by neglect, or diſheartened by diſcouragement. Chatterton, doubtleſs, at that very period, was poſſeſſed of a vigour of underſtanding, of a quickneſs of penetration, a boldneſs of imagination, far ſuperior to the talents of his companions. But that penetration itſelf led him, perhaps, to feel more ſtrongly his own deficiences. Thoſe delicate, yet vivid feelings which uſually accompany real abilities, induced him to decline a conteſt, in which there was a danger of experiencing the mortification of being inferior. If he produced any compoſitions, his exquiſite taſte led him to ſuppreſs them. In the mean time he was laying in ſtores of information, and improving both his imagination and his judgment. About his tenth year he acquired a taſte for reading; and out of the trifle, which was allowed him by his mother for pocket-money, he began to hire books from a circulating library. As his taſte was different from children of his age, his diſpoſitions were alſo different. Inſtead of the thoughtleſs levity of childhood, he poſſeſſed the gravity, penſiveneſs, and melancholy of maturer life. His ſpirits were uneven: he was frequently ſo loſt in contemplation, that for many days together he would ſay very little, and apparently by conſtraint. His intimates in the ſchool were few, and thoſe of the moſt ſerious caſt. Between his eleventh and twelfth year, he wrote a Catalogue of the Books he had read, to the number of ſeventy. It is rather unfortunate that this Catalogue was not preſerved: his ſiſter only informs us that they principally conſiſted of hiſtory and divinity (l). At the hours allotted him for play, he generally retired to read, and he was particularly ſolicitous to borrow books (m). Though he does not appear to have manifeſted any violent inclination to diſplay his abilities, yet we have undoubted proofs that very early in life, he did not fail to exerciſe himſelf in compoſition. His ſiſter having made him a preſent of a pocket-book as a New-Year's gift, he returned it to her at the end of the year filled with writing, chiefly poetry (n). It was probably from the remains of this pocket-book, that the author of Love and Madneſs tranſcribed a poem, which appears by the date (April 14th, 1764) to have been written at the age of eleven years and a half [C]. This fact is certainly

When very young, a manufacturer promiſed to make Mrs. Chatterton's children a preſent of ſome earthen-ware. On aſking the boy what device he would have painted on his—"Paint me (ſaid he) an angel, with wings, and a trumpet, to trumpet my name over the world (1)."

[B] With one Thomas Philips.] In all probability the perſon on whoſe death Chatterton compoſed an Elegy. I wiſh we were poſſeſſed of more perfect memoirs of Philips. His taſte for poetry excited a ſimilar flame in ſeveral young men, who made no mean figure in the periodical publications of that day, in Chatterton, Thiſtlethwaite, Cary, Fowler, and others.

[C] Which appears to have been written at the age of eleven years and a half.] It may not be improper to produce this Poem, not only as it is the earlieſt exiſting ſpecimen of Chatterton's compoſitions, but alſo for the ſake of ſome remarks, which will probably throw ſome light on the genius and character of its author.

APOSTATE WILL, by T. C.

In days of old, when Weſley's pow'r
Gather'd new ſtrength by every hour;
Apoſtate Will juſt ſunk in trade,
Reſolv'd his bargain ſhould be made;

Then

tainly a ſtrong contradiction to Mr. Thiſtlethwaite's aſſertion; yet perhaps it is not on the whole ſo difficult to be reconciled as may at firſt be ſuſpected. In the regiſters of the memory, a few months is but a trifling anachroniſm. Beſides, though Chatterton might compoſe at that time, it does not follow that he was under any neceſſity of imparting his compoſitions to Mr. Thiſtlethwaite or Mr. Philips. Indeed, he was the leſs likely to make them public, as they were of the ſatirical kind, and conſequently, if diſcovered, the boy might be apprehenſive of expoſing himſelf to puniſhment.

At twelve years old he was confirmed by the Biſhop: His ſiſter adds, that he made very ſenſible and ſerious remarks on the awfulneſs of the ceremony, and on his own feelings preparatory to it (o). Happy had it been for him if theſe ſentiments, ſo congenial to the amiable diſpoſitions of youth, had continued to influence his conduct during his maturer years. He ſoon after, during the week in which he was door-keeper, made ſome verſes on the laſt day, paraphraſed the ninth chapter of Job, and ſome chapters of Iſaiah. The bent of his genius, however, more ſtrongly inclined him to ſatire, of which he was tolerably laviſh on his ſchool-fellows; nor did the Upper-maſter, Mr. Warner, eſcape the rod of his reprehenſion. The firſt poetical eſſays of moſt young authors are in the paſtoral ſtyle, when the imagination is luxuriant, the hopes and contemplations romantic, and when the mind is better acquainted with the objects of nature and of the ſight than with any other. But Chatterton, without the advantages of education or encouragement, and, on theſe accounts, diffident perhaps of his own powers, wanted the ſtimulative of indignation to prompt him to action; and a quickneſs of reſentment appears through life to have been one of his moſt diſtinguiſhing characteriſtics [D]. From what has been related, it is probable that Chatterton was no great favourite with Mr. Warner: he, however, found a (o) Mrs. Newton's Letter.

Then ſtrait to Weſley he repairs,
And puts on grave and ſolemn airs;
Then thus the pious man addreſs'd,
Good Sir, I think your doctrine beſt,
Your ſervant will a Weſley be,
Therefore the principles teach me.
The preacher then inſtructions gave,
How he in this world ſhould behave,
He hears, aſſents, and gives a nod,
Says every word's the word of God.
Then lifting his diſſembling eyes,
How bleſſed is the ſect he cries,
Nor Bingham, Young, nor Stillingfleet
Shall make me from this ſect retreat.
He then his circumſtance declar'd,
How hardly with him matters far'd,
Begg'd him next meeting for to make
A ſmall collection for his ſake;
The preacher ſaid, do not repine,
The whole collection ſhall be thine.
With looks demure and cringing bows,
About his buſineſs ſtrait he goes;
His outward acts were grave and prim,
The Methodiſt appear'd in him.
But, be his outward what it will,
His heart was an Apoſtate's ſtill;
He'd oft profeſs an hallow'd flame,
And every where preach'd Weſley's name;
He was a preacher and what not,
As long as money could be got;
He'd oft profeſs with holy fire,
The labourer's worthy of his hire.

It happen'd once upon a time,
When all his works were in their prime,
A noble place appear'd in view,
Then—to the Methodiſts, adieu:
A Methodiſt no more he'll be,
The Proteſtants ſerve beſt for he:
Then to the curate ſtrait he ran,
And thus addreſs'd the rev'rend man;
I was a Methodiſt, 'tis true,
With penitence I turn to you;
O that it were your bounteous will
That I the vacant place might fill!
With juſtice I'd myſelf acquit,
Do every thing that's right and fit.
The curate ſtraitway gave conſent—
To take the place he quickly went.
Accordingly he took the place,
And keeps it with diſſembled grace.

April 14, 1764.

In the firſt place, this Poem ſhews the early turn and bent of his genius to ſatire, which predominated throughout his ſhort life, and with which he began and ended his literary career. Not only his ſchool-fellows and his inſtructors became the ſubjects of it at this early period, but his acquaintance and his friends felt its force.

In the next place, it appears that he was then no ſtranger to the works of Bingham, Young, and Stillingfleet, which were probably among the books of divinity that compoſed the liſt of thoſe he had read or conſulted, as mentioned in Mrs. Newton's Letter.

Laſtly, let it be obſerved, that the perſon he ſatirizes is ſuppoſed to have turned methodiſt for mercenary motives, and to have preached the goſpel merely to put money in his purſe.—Now Mr. Thiſtlethwaite, in his letter to Dean Milles, after mentioning Chatterton's intentions of leaving his maſter's ſervice and going to London, ſays—"I interrogated him as to the objects of his views and expectations, and what mode of life he intended to purſue on his arrival at London. The anſwer I received was a memorable one: My firſt attempt, ſaid he, ſhall be in the literary way; the promiſes I have received are ſufficient to diſpel doubt; but ſhould I, contrary to my expectations, find myſelf deceived, I will in that caſe turn Methodiſt preacher. Credulity is as potent a deity as ever, and a new ſect may eaſily be deviſed," &c.

(2) Milles's Rowley, p. 459.

Chatterton might in ſome meaſure have in view the character which he had before ſo ſucceſsfully depicted, when he thus expreſſed himſelf to Mr. Thiſtlethwaite. As his genius was verſatile, and his reading extenſive, it is poſſible this profeſſion might not be without ſome ſerious foundation. Indeed, if we are to believe that the fragment of a ſermon, which he produced as Rowley's, was really his own compoſition, certainly many a quack preacher ſets out upon a much ſlenderer ſtock of divinity than Chatterton was maſter of at that time. The imagination, however, forms many ſchemes which the heart wants fortitude to reduce to action; and perhaps, after all, his declaration to Mr. T. might be no more than a temporary piece of gaiety, and that he might ſtill, though releaſed from religious ſcruples, abhor the diſhonourable character of a hypocrite.

[D] Appears through life to have been one of his moſt diſtinguiſhing characteriſtics.] A late French writer, in his Memoirs of the Poet De la Harpe, who had manifeſted a like turn for ſatire in his early years, ſays—"La ſatyre eſt la premiere qualité qui ſe develope ordinairement dans un jeune poete. Celui ſe l'exerce d'unefaçon ridicule envers ſes maitres & meme envers M. Aſſalin."

friend in the Under-maſter, Mr. Haynes, who conceived for him, I have been informed, a ſtrong and affectionate attachment.

" A very remarkable fact is recorded by Mr. Thiſtlethwaite in the letter already quoted. " Going down Horſe-ſtreet, near the ſchool, one day," ſays he, " I accidentally met with Chatterton. Entering into converſation with him, the ſubject of which I do not now recollect, he informed me that he was in the poſſeſſion of certain old manuſcripts, which had been found depoſited in a cheſt in Redcliffe church, and that he had lent ſome or one of them to Philips. Within a day or two after this I ſaw Philips, and repeated to him the information I had received from Chatterton. Philips produced a manuſcript on parchment or vellum, which I am confident was Elenoure and Juga (p), a kind of paſtoral eclogue, afterwards publiſhed in the Town and Country Magazine for May 1769. The parchment or vellum appeared to have been cloſely pared round the margin; for what purpoſe, or by what accident, I know not, but the words were evidently entire and unmutilated. As the writing was yellow and pale, manifeſtly (as I conceive) occaſioned by age, and conſequently difficult to decypher, Philips had with his pen traced and gone over ſeveral of the lines, (which, as far as my recollection ſerves, were written in the manner of proſe, and without any regard to punctuation,) and by that means laboured to attain the object of his purſuit, an inveſtigation of their meaning. I endeavoured to aſſiſt him: but from an almoſt total ignorance of the characters, manners, language, and orthography of the age in which the lines were written, all our efforts were unprofitably exerted; and though we arrived at the explanation of, and connected many of the words, ſtill the ſenſe was notoriouſly deficient (q)." If this narrative may be depended on, Chatterton had diſcovered theſe manuſcripts before he was twelve years of age. It is, however, ſcarcely conſiſtent with other accounts, ſince both Mrs. Chatterton and her daughter ſeem to be of opinion, that he knew nothing of the parchments brought from Redcliffe Church, which were ſuppoſed to contain Rowley's poems, till after he had left ſchool (r). Under all the diſadvantages of education, the acquiſitions of Chatterton were ſurpriſing. Beſides the variety of reading which he had gone through, the author of Love and Madneſs remarks, that he had ſome knowledge of muſic (s). Is it not probable that a few of the rudiments of vocal muſic made a part of the education of a charity boy? He had alſo acquired a taſte for drawing, which afterwards he greatly improved; and the Uſher of the ſchool aſſerted he had made a rapid progreſs in arithmetic (t). Soon after he left ſchool, he correſponded with a boy, who had been his bed-fellow while at Colſton's, and was bound apprentice to a Merchant at New-York [D]. Mrs. Newton ſays, he read a letter at home, which he wrote to this friend: it conſiſted of a collection of all the hard words in the Engliſh language, and he requeſted his friend to anſwer it in the ſame ſtyle. An extraordinary effect of his diſcovering an employment adapted to his genius is remarked in the ſame letter. He had been gloomy from the time he began to learn, but it was obſerved that he became more cheerful after he began to write poetry (u).

On the firſt of July 1767, he left the Charity-ſchool, and was bound apprentice to Mr. John Lambert, Attorney, of Briſtol, for ſeven years, to learn the art and myſtery of a ſcrivener. The apprentice fee was ten pounds; the maſter was to find him in meat, drink, lodging, and clothes; the mother in waſhing and mending. He ſlept in the ſame room with the foot-boy, and went every morning at eight o'clock to the office, which was at ſome diſtance, and, except the uſual time for dinner, continued there till eight o'clock at night, after which he was at liberty till ten, when he was always expected to be at home. Mr. Lambert affords the moſt honourable teſtimony in Chatterton's favour, with reſpect to the regularity of his attendance, as he never exceeded the limited hours but once, when he had leave to ſpend the evening with his mother and ſome friends (w). His hours of leiſure alſo Mr. Lambert had no reaſon to ſuſpect were ſpent in improper company, but generally with his mother, Mr. Clayfield, Mr. Barrett, or Mr. Catcott. He never had occaſion to charge him with neglect of buſineſs, or any ill behaviour whatever. Once, and but once, he thought himſelf under the neceſſity of correcting him, and that was the pure effect of his diſpoſition for ſatire. A ſhort time after he was bound to Mr. Lambert, his old Schoolmaſter received a very abuſive anonymous letter, which he ſuſpected came from Chatterton, and he complained of it to his maſter, who was ſoon convinced of the juſtice of the complaint, not only from the hand-writing, which was ill-diſguiſed [F], but from the letter being written on the ſame paper with that which was uſed in the office. On this occaſion Mr. Lambert corrected the boy with a blow or two. He, however, accuſes him of a ſullen and gloomy temper, which particularly diſplayed itſelf among the ſervants (x). panies theſe qualities, doubtleſs rendered him an unfit inhabitant of the kitchen, where his ignorant aſſociates would naturally be inclined to envy, and would affect to deſpiſe thoſe accompliſhments, which he held in the higheſt eſtimation: and even the familiarity of vulgar and illiterate perſons, muſt undoubtedly be rather diſguſting than agreeable to a mind like his.

Mr. Lambert's was a ſituation not unfavourable to the cultivation of his genius. Though much confined, he had much leiſure. His maſter's buſineſs conſumed a very ſmall portion of his time: frequently, his ſiſter ſays, it did not engage him about two hours in a day (y). While Mr. Lambert was from home, and no particular buſineſs interfered, his ſtated employment was to copy precedents; a book of which, containing 344 large folio pages, cloſely written by Chatterton while he remained in the office, is, I believe, ſtill in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Lambert, as well as another of about thirty pages. The office library contained nothing but law books; except an old edition of Camden's Britannia. There is no doubt, however, but Chatterton took care amply to ſupply his mental wants from his old acquaintance at the circulating libraries.

He had continued this courſe of life for upwards of a year; not, however, without ſome ſymptoms of an averſion for his profeſſion, before he began to attract the notice of the literary world. In the beginning of October 1768, the new bridge at Briſtol was finiſhed. At that time there appeared, in Farley's Briſtol Journal, an account of the ceremonies on opening the old bridge, introduced by a letter to the printer, intimating that "The following deſcription of the Fryars firſt paſſing over the old bridge, was taken from an ancient manuſcript," and ſigned "Dunhelmus Briſtolienſis [G]." The paper, if it be allowed to be the fabrication of modern times, demonſtrates ſtrong powers of invention, and an uncommon knowledge of ancient cuſtoms. So ſingular a memoir could not fail to excite curioſity, and many perſons became anxious to ſee the original. The printer, Mr. Farley, could give no account of it, nor of the perſon who brought the copy; but after much inquiry, it was diſcovered that the manuſcript was brought by a youth between fifteen and ſixteen years of age, of the name of Thomas Chatterton (z). "To the threats of thoſe who treated him (agreeably to his appearance) as a child, he returned nothing but haughtineſs, and a refuſal to give any account (a)." By milder uſage he was ſomewhat ſoftened, and appeared inclined to give all the information in his power. He at firſt alledged, that he was employed to tranſcribe the contents of certain ancient manuſcripts by a Gentleman, who alſo had engaged him to furniſh complimentary verſes, inſcribed to a Lady with whom that Gentleman was in love. On being farther preſſed, he at laſt informed the inquirers, that he had received the paper in queſtion, together with many other manuſcripts, from his father, who had found them in a large cheſt in the upper room over the chapel, on the North ſide of Redcliffe Church (b). But a ſtill more circumſtantial account of the diſcovery of theſe manuſcripts, is preſerved in Mr. Bryant's Obſervations on Rowley's Poems. Over the North porch of St. Mary Redcliffe Church, which was founded, or at leaſt rebuilt, by Mr. W. Canynge, (an eminent Merchant of Briſtol in the fifteenth century, and in the reign of Edward the Fourth), there is a kind of monument room, in which were depoſited ſix or ſeven cheſts, one of which in particular was called

Mr. Canynge's cofre [H]. This cheſt, it is ſaid, was ſecured by ſix keys, two of which were entruſted to the Miniſter and Procurator of the Church, two to the Mayor, and one to each of the Church-wardens. In proceſs of time, however, the ſix keys appear to have been loſt; and about the year 1727, a notion prevailed that ſome title deeds, and other writings of value, were contained in Mr. Canynge's cofre. In conſequence of this opinion, an order of veſtry was made, that the cheſt ſhould be opened under the inſpection of an attorney; and that thoſe writings which appeared of conſequence, ſhould be removed to the ſouth porch of the church. The locks were therefore forced, and not only the principal cheſt, but the others, which were alſo ſuppoſed to contain writings, were all broken open. The deeds immediately relating to the church were removed, and the other manuſcripts were left expoſed as of no value. Conſiderable depredations had, from time to time, been committed upon them, by different perſons; but the moſt inſatiate of theſe plunderers was the father of Chatterton. His uncle's being Sexton of St. Mary Redcliffe gave him free acceſs to the church. He carried off, from time to time, parcels of the parchments, and one time alone, with the aſſiſtance of his boy, is known to have filled a large baſket with them. They were depoſited in a cupboard in the ſchool, and employed for different purpoſes, ſuch as the covering of copy books, &c. In particular, Mr. Gibbs, the Miniſter of the pariſh, having preſented the boys with twenty Bibles, Mr. Chatterton, in order to preſerve theſe books from being damaged, covered them with ſome of the parchments. At his death, the widow being under a neceſſity of removing, carried the remainder of them to her own habitation. Of the diſcovery of their value by the younger Chatterton, the account of Mr. Smith, a very intimate acquaintance, which he gave to Dr. Glynn of Cambridge, is too intereſting to be omitted. "When young Chatterton was firſt articled to Mr. Lambert, he uſed frequently to come home to his mother, by way of a ſhort viſit. There, one day, his eye was caught by one of theſe parchments, which had been converted into a thread-paper. He found not only the writing to be very old, the characters very different from common characters, but that the ſubject therein treated was different from common ſubjects. Being naturally of an inquiſitive and curious turn, he was very much ſtruck with their appearance, and, as might be expected, began to queſtion his mother what thoſe thread papers were, how ſhe got them, and whence they came. Upon farther enquiry, he was led to a full diſcovery of all the parchments which remained (c)." The bulk of them conſiſted of poetical and other compoſitions, by Mr. Canynge, and a particular friend of his, Thomas Rowley, whom Chatterton at firſt called a Monk, and afterwards a Secular Prieſt of the fifteenth century. Such, at leaſt, appears to be the account which Chatterton thought proper to give, and which he wiſhed to be believed. It is, indeed, confirmed by the teſtimony of his mother and ſiſter. Mrs. Chatterton informed a friend of the Dean of Exeter, that on her removal from Pyle-ſtreet, ſhe emptied the cupboard of its contents, partly into a large long deal box, where her huſband uſed to keep his clothes, and partly into a ſquare oak box of a ſmaller ſize; carrying both with their contents to her lodgings, where, according to her account, they continued neglected and undiſturbed, till her ſon firſt diſcovered their value; who having examined their contents, told his mother, 'that he had found a treaſure, and was ſo glad nothing could be like it:' that he then removed all theſe parchments out of the large long deal box, in which his father uſed to keep his clothes, into the ſquare oak box: that he was perpetually ranſacking every corner of the houſe for more parchments, and, from time to time, carried away thoſe he had already found by pockets full: that one day happening to ſee Clarke's Hiſtory of the Bible covered with one of thoſe parchments, he ſwore a great oath, and ſtripping the book, put the cover into his pocket, and carried it away; at the ſame time ſtripping a common little Bible, but finding no writing upon the cover, replaced it again very leiſurely (d). "Upon being informed of the manner in which his father had procured the parchments, he went himſelf to the place, and picked up four more, which, if Mrs. Chatterton rightly remembers, Mr. Barrett has at this time in his poſſeſſion (e)." "Mrs. Newton, his ſiſter, being aſked, if ſhe remembers his having mentioned Rowley's poems, after the diſcovery of the parchments; ſays, that he was perpetually talking on that ſubject, and once in particular, (about two years before he left Briſtol) when a relation, one Mr. Stephens of Saliſbury, made them a viſit, he talked of nothing elſe (f)."

Nearly about the time when the paper in Farley's Journal, concerning the old bridge, became the ſubject of converſation, as Mr. Catcott of Briſtol, a Gentleman of an inquiſitive turn, and fond of reading, was walking with a friend in Redcliffe church, he was informed by him of ſeveral ancient pieces of poetry, which had been found there, and which were in the poſſeſſion of a young perſon with whom he was acquainted. This perſon proved to be Chatterton, to whom Mr. Catcott deſired to be introduced. He accordingly had an interview; and ſoon after obtained from him, very readily, without any reward, the Briſtow

Tragedy (g), Rowley's Epitaph upon Mr. Canynge's anceſtor (h), with ſome other ſmaller pieces. In a few days he brought ſome more, among which was the Yellow Roll. About this period, Mr. Barrett, a reſpectable Surgeon in Briſtol, and a man of letters, had projected a hiſtory of his native city, and was anxiouſly collecting materials for that work. Such a diſcovery, therefore, as that of Chatterton, could ſcarcely eſcape the vigilance of Mr. Barrett's friends. The pieces in Mr. Catcott's poſſeſſion, of which ſome were copies and ſome originals, were immediately communicated to Mr. Barrett, whoſe friendſhip and patronage by theſe means our young literary adventurer was fortunate enough to ſecure. During the firſt converſations which Mr. Catcott had with him, he heard him mention the names of moſt of the poems ſince printed, as being in his poſſeſſion. He afterwards grew more ſuſpicious and reſerved; and it was but rarely, and with difficulty, that any more originals could be obtained from him. He confeſſed to Mr. Catcott that he had deſtroyed ſeveral; and ſome which he owned to have been in his poſſeſſion, were never afterwards ſeen. One of theſe was the tragedy of the Apoſtate, of which a ſmall part only has been preſerved by Mr. Barrett. The ſubject of it was the apoſtatizing of a perſon from the Chriſtian to the Jewiſh faith (i). Mr. Barrett, however, obtained from him at different times ſeveral fragments, ſome of them of a conſiderable length. They are all written upon vellum, and he aſſerted them to be a part of the original manuſcripts, which he had obtained in the manner which has been already related. A fac ſimile of one of theſe fragments is publiſhed in Mr. Tyrwhitt's and Dr. Milles's editions of Rowley's Poems; and the fragments in proſe, which are conſiderably larger, we are taught to expect in Mr. Barrett's Hiſtory of Briſtol. In the ſame work we are alſo promiſed "A Diſcorſe on Briſtowe," and the other hiſtorical pieces in proſe, which Chatterton at different times delivered out, as copied from Rowley's manuſcripts (k)."

(k) Preface to Rowley's Poems, p. 11. It is now ſaid that Mr. B. does not mean to inſert any of theſe pieces in his Hiſtory.

The friendſhip of Mr. Barrett and Mr. Catcott was of conſiderable advantage to Chatterton. They ſupplied him occaſionally with money, as a compenſation for ſome of the fragments of Rowley, with which he gratified them [I]. He ſpent many agreeable hours in their company; and their acquaintance introduced him into a more reſpectable line than he could eaſily have attained without it. His ſiſter remarks, that after he was introduced to theſe Gentlemen, his ambition daily and perceptibly encreaſed; and he would frequently ſpeak in raptures of the undoubted ſucceſs of his plan for future life. "When in ſpirits, he would enjoy his riſing fame; and, confident of advancement, he would promiſe his mother and I ſhould be partakers of his ſucceſs (l)." Both theſe Gentlemen alſo lent him books. Mr. Barrett lent him ſeveral medical authors (m), and, at his requeſt, gave him ſome inſtructions in ſurgery. His taſte was verſatile, and his ſtudies various. In the courſe of the years 1768 and 1769, Mr. Thiſtlethwaite frequently ſaw him, and deſcribes in a lively manner the employment of his leiſure hours. "One day," ſays Mr. T. "he might be found buſily employed in the ſtudy of heraldry and Engliſh antiquities, both of which are numbered among the moſt favourite of his purſuits; the next diſcovered him deeply engaged, confounded and perplexed amidſt the ſubtleties of metaphyſical diſquiſition, or loſt and bewildered in the abſtruſe labyrinth of mathematical reſearches; and theſe in an inſtant again neglected and thrown aſide, to make room for muſic and aſtronomy, of both which ſciences his knowledge was entirely confined to theory. Even phyſic was not without a charm to allure his imagination, and he would talk of Galen, Hippocrates, and Paracelſus, with all the confidence and familiarity of a modern empirick (n)." It may naturally be ſuppoſed, that his acquaintance with moſt of theſe ſciences was very ſuperficial; but his knowledge of antiquities was extenſive, and we might perhaps ſay profound. With a view of perfecting himſelf in theſe favourite ſtudies, he borrowed Skinner's Etymologicon of Mr. Barrett, but returned it in a few days as uſeleſs, moſt of the interpretations being in Latin. He alſo borrowed Benſon's Saxon Vocabulary, but returned it immediately on the ſame account (o). His diſappointment was partly compenſated by the acquiſition of Kerſey's Dictionary, and Speght's Chaucer, (the Gloſſary to which he carefully tranſcribed (p). With theſe books he was furniſhed by Mr. Green, a Bookſeller in Briſtol. Probably the mortification he received at not being able to make that uſe which he deſired of Skinner and of Benſon, might be an additional ſtimulative to the great inclination which he manifeſted to acquaint himſelf with Latin, and his deſign to attempt it without a maſter. From this project his friend, Mr. Smith, took great pains to diſſuade him, and adviſed him rather to apply to French, a competent knowledge of which might be ſooner attained, and which promiſed to be of more eſſential ſervice (q). Whatever plan he adopted, he enteted upon it with an earneſtneſs and fervour almoſt unexampled. Indeed, the poetic enthuſiaſm was never more ſtrongly exhibited than in Chatterton. Like Milton, he fancied he was more capable of writing well at ſome particular times than at others, and the full of the moon was the ſeaſon when he imagined his genius to be in perfection; at which period, as if the immediate preſence of that luminary added to the inſpiration, he frequently devoted a conſiderable portion of the night to compoſition (r).— " He was always," ſays Mr. Smith, " extremely fond of walking in the fields, particularly in Redcliffe meadows, and of talking about theſe (Rowley's) manuſcripts, and ſometimes reading them there. " Come (he would ſay) you and I will take a walk in the " meadow. I have got the clevereſt thing for you imaginable. It is worth half-a-crown " merely to have a ſight of it, and to hear me read it to you." When we arrived at the place propoſed, he would produce his parchment, ſhew it and read it to me. There was one ſpot in particular, full in view of the church, in which he ſeemed to take a peculiar delight. He would frequently lay himſelf down, fix his eyes upon the church, and ſeem as if he were in a kind of trance. Then, on a ſudden and abruptly, he would tell me, " that ſteeple was burnt down by lightning: that was the place where they formerly " acted plays (s)." His Sundays were commonly ſpent in walking alone into the country about Briſtol, as far as the duration of day-light would allow; and from theſe excurſions he never failed to bring home with him drawings of churches, or of ſome other objects, which had impreſſed his romantic imagination [K].

His attention, while at Briſtol, was not confined to Rowley: his pen was exerciſed in a variety of pieces, chiefly ſatirical, and ſeveral eſſays, both in proſe and verſe, which he ſent to the Magazines. I have not been able to trace any thing of Chatterton's in the Town and Country Magazine (with which he appears to have firſt correſponded) before February 1769; but in the acknowledgments to correſpondents for November 1768, we find " D. B. of Briſtol's favour will be gladly received." Dunhelmus Briſtolienſis was the ſignature he generally employed. In the courſe of the year 1769, he was a conſiderable contributor to that publication. One of the firſt of his pieces which appeared was a letter on the tinctures of the Saxon heralds, dated Briſtol, February 4; and in the ſame Magazine a poem was inſerted on Mr. Alcock, of Briſtol, an excellent Miniature Painter, ſigned Aſaphides [L]. In the ſame Magazine for March are ſome extracts from Rowley's manuſcripts; and in different numbers for the ſucceeding months, ſome pieces called Saxon Poems, written in the ſtyle of Oſſian.

The whole of Chatterton's life preſents a fund of uſeful inſtruction to young perſons of brilliant and lively talents, and affords a ſtrong diſſuaſive againſt that impetuoſity of expectation, and thoſe deluſive hopes of ſucceſs, founded upon the conſciouſneſs of genius and merit, which lead them to neglect the ordinary means of acquiring competence and independence. The early diſguſt which Chatterton conceived for his profeſſion, may be accounted one of the prime ſources of his misfortunes. Among the efforts which he made to extricate himſelf from this irkſome ſituation, the moſt remarkable is his application to the Hon. Horace Walpole, in March 1769 (t); the ground of which was an offer to furniſh him with ſome accounts of a ſeries of great painters, who had flouriſhed at Briſtol, which Chatterton ſaid had been lately diſcovered, with ſome old poems, in that city. The pacquet ſent by Chatterton was left at Bathurſt's, Mr. Walpole's Bookſeller, and contained, beſide this letter, an ode or little poem, of two or three ſtanzas in an alternate rhyme, on the death of Richard I. as a ſpecimen of the poems which were found. Mr. Walpole had but juſt before been made the inſtrument of introducing into the world Mr. M'Pherſon's forgeries: a ſimilar application, therefore, ſerved at once to awaken his ſuſpicion. He, however, anſwered Chatterton's letter, deſiring farther information; and in reply, was informed, that " he (Chatterton) was the ſon of a poor widow, who ſupported him with great difficulty; that he was apprentice to an Attorney, but had a taſte for more elegant ſtudies." The letter hinted a wiſh that Mr. Walpole would aſſiſt him in emerging from ſo dull a profeſſion, by procuring ſome place, in which he might purſue the natural bias of his genius. He affirmed that great treaſures of ancient poetry had been diſcovered at Briſtol, and were in the hands of a perſon who had lent him the ſpecimen already tranſmitted, as well as a paſtoral (Elinoure and Juga) which accompanied this ſecond letter. Mr. Walpole wrote to a friend, a noble Lady at Bath, to enquire after the author of theſe letters, who found his account of himſelf verified in every particular. In the mean time the ſpecimens were communicated to Mr. Gray and Mr. Maſon, and theſe Gentlemen, at firſt ſight, pronounced them forgeries. Mr. Walpole, though convinced of the author's intention to impoſe upon him, could not, as he himſelf confeſſes, help admiring the ſpirit of poetry which animated theſe compoſitions. The teſtimonies of his approbation, however, were too cold to produce in Chatterton any thing but laſting diſguſt. Mr. Walpole's reply was indeed (according to his own account) rather too much in the common-place ſtyle of Court replies; though ſome allowance is to be made for his peculiar ſituation, and for his juſt apprehenſion of a new impoſition to be practiſed on him. He complained in general terms of his want of power to be a patron, and adviſed the young man to apply himſelf to the duties of his profeſſion, as more certain means of attaining the independence and leiſure of which he was deſirous. This frigid reception extracted immediately from Chatterton, "a peeviſh letter," deſiring the manuſcripts back, as they were the property of another; and Mr. Walpole, either offended at the warm and independent ſpirit which was manifeſted by the boy, or pleaſed to be diſengaged from the buſineſs in ſo eaſy a manner, proceeded on a journey to Paris, without taking any farther notice of him. On his return, which was not for ſome time, he found another epiſtle from Chatterton, in a ſtyle (as he terms it) "ſingularly impertinent;" expreſſive of much reſentment on account of the detention of his poems, roughly demanding them back, and adding, "that Mr. Walpole would not have dared to uſe him ſo ill, had he not been acquainted with the narrowneſs of his circumſtances." The conſequence was, therefore, ſuch as might be expected. Mr. Walpole returned his poems and his letters in a blank cover, and never afterwards heard from him or of him during his life (u). The affront was never forgiven by the diſappointed Poet, though it is perhaps more than repaid by the ridiculous portrait which he has exhibited of Mr. W———, in the Memoirs of a Sad Dog, under the character of "the redoubted Baron Otranto (w), who has ſpent his whole life in conjectures."

On the ſcore of theſe tranſactions, Mr. Walpole has incurred more cenſure than he really deſerved. In an age when literature is ſo little patronized by thoſe who wield all the powers of the ſtate, and have in truſt for the public the diſtribution of its emoluments; when men of the firſt abilities, actually engaged in the learned profeſſions, are permitted to languiſh in obſcurity and poverty, without any of thoſe rewards, which are appropriated to the profeſſions they exerciſe, and are compelled to depend for a precarious ſubſiſtence on the ſcanty pittance, which they derive from diurnal drudgery in the ſervice of Bookſellers, it can ſcarcely be deemed an inſtance of extraordinary illiberality that a private man, though a man of fortune, ſhould be inattentive to the petition of a perfect ſtranger, a young man, whoſe birth or education entitled him to no high pretenſions, and who had only conceived an unreaſonable diſlike to a profeſſion both lucrative and reſpectable. If Chatterton had actually avowed the poems, perhaps a very generous and feeling heart, ſuch as rarely exiſts at preſent, and leaſt of all in the higher circles of life, might have been more ſtrongly affected with their beauties, and might probably have extended ſome ſmall degree of encouragement. But conſidering things as they are, and not as they ought to be, it was a degree of unuſual condeſcenſion to take any notice whatever of the application; and when Chatterton felt ſo poignantly his diſappointment, he only demonſtrated his ignorance of the ſtate of patronage in this country, and acted like a young and ingenuous perſon, who judged of the feelings of the courtiers by the generous emotions of his own breaſt, or the practice of times, which exiſt now only in the records of romance. Mr. Walpole afterwards regretted, and I believe ſincerely, that he had not ſeen this extraordinary youth, and that he did not pay a more favourable attention to his correſpondence: but, to be neglected in life, and regretted and admired when theſe paſſions can be no longer of ſervice, has been the uſual fate of learning and genius. Mr. Walpole was certainly under no obligation of patronizing Chatterton. To have encouraged and befriended him, would have been an exertion of liberality and munificence uncommon in the preſent day: but to aſcribe to Mr. Walpole's neglect (if it can even merit ſo harſh an appellation) the dreadful cataſtrophe, which happened at the diſtance of nearly two years after, would be the higheſt degree of injuſtice and abſurdity [M].

The

[M] Would be the higheſt degree of injuſtice and abſurdity.] A learned and reſpectable friend, on reading theſe memoirs in manuſcript, favoured me with the following able vindication of Mr. W. which, for the ſatisfaction of thoſe who wiſh for the fulleſt information on the ſubject, I inſert intire.

It has already been ſtated, that, in March 1769, Chatterton, not long after his acquaintance with Mr. Barrett and Mr. Catcott, to whom he had communicated ſome originals and ſome tranſcripts of Rowley's Poems, wrote a letter to Mr. H. Walpole, incloſing alſo a ſpecimen of the Poems, and ſoliciting his patronage. Let the reader take the account in Mr. Walpole's own words, from an extract of a letter to Mr. W. B. added to another letter to the Editor of Chatterton's Miſcellanies, and printed at Strawberry-hill, 1779.

"I am far from determined to publiſh any thing "about Chatterton. It would almoſt look like "making myſelf a party. I do not love controverſy: "if I print, my chief reaſon would be, that both "in the account of the Poems, and in Mr. Warton's "laſt volume, my name has been brought in with "ſo little circumſpection and accuracy, that it looks "as if my rejection of Chatterton had driven him "to deſpair; whereas I was the firſt perſon on whom "he eſſayed his art and ambition, inſtead of being "the laſt. I never ſaw him; there was an interval "of near two years between his application to me "and his diſmal end; nor had he quitted his maſter, "nor was neceſſitous, nor otherwiſe poor than Attornies clerks uſually are; nor had he come to "London, nor launched into diſſipation, when his "correſpondence with me ſtopped. As faithfully as "I can recollect the circumſtances, without dates, "and without ſearching for what few memorandums "I preſerved relative to him, I will recapitulate his "hiſtory with me. Bathurſt, my Bookſeller, brought "me a pacquet left with him: it contained an ode, "or little poem, of two or three ſtanzas in alternate "rhyme, on the death of Richard the Firſt, and I "was told, in very few lines, that it had been found "at Briſtol, with many other old poems, and that "the poſſeſſor could furniſh me with accounts of a "ſeries

The reader has hitherto contemplated Chatterton in the pleaſing light of an ingenious and virtuous youth. I reluctantly proceed to develope the only circumſtance which has involved

" ſeries of great painters, who had flouriſhed at " Briſtol.

" Here I muſt pauſe, to mention my own re- " flections. At firſt I concluded that ſomebody " having met with my Anecdotes of Painting, had " a mind to laugh at me; I thought not very in- " genuouſly, as I was not likely to ſwallow a ſucceſ- " ſion of great Painters at Briſtol. The ode, or " ſonnet (5), as I think it was called, was too pretty " to be part of the plan; and, as is eaſy with all " the other ſuppoſed poems of Rowley, it was not " difficult to make it modern by changing the old " words for new, though yet more difficult than " with moſt of them. You ſee I tell you fairly the " caſe.

" I wrote, according to the incloſed direction, for " farther particulars. Chatterton, in anſwer, in- " formed me that he was the ſon of a poor widow, " who ſupported him with great difficulty; that he " was clerk or apprentice to an Attorney, but had " a taſte and turn for more elegant ſtudies; and " hinted a wiſh that I would aſſiſt him with my in- " tereſt in emerging out of ſo dull a profeſſion, by " procuring him ſome place, in which he could " purſue his natural bent. He affirmed that great " treaſures of ancient poetry had been diſcovered in " his native city, and were in the hands of a perſon, " who had lent him thoſe he had tranſmitted to me; " for he now ſent me others, amongſt which was an " abſolute modern paſtoral in dialogue, thinly " ſprinkled with old words (6). Pray obſerve, Sir, " that he affirmed having received the poems from " another perſon; whereas it is aſcertained that the " Gentleman at Briſtol, who poſſeſſes the fund of " Rowley's poems, received them from Chatterton.

" I wrote to a relation of mine at Bath, to en- " quire into the ſituation and character of Chatter- " ton, according to his own account of himſelf: " nothing was returned about his character, but his " ſtory was verified.

" In the mean time I communicated the poems to " Mr. Gray and Mr. Maſon, who at once pro- " nounced them forgeries, and declared there was " no ſymptom in them of their being the productions " of near ſo diſtant an age; the language and metres " being totally unlike any thing ancient.

" Well, Sir, being ſatisfied with my intelligence " about Chatterton, I wrote him a letter with as " much kindneſs and tenderneſs as if I had been his " guardian; for though I had no doubt of his im- " poſitions, ſuch a ſpirit of poetry breathed in his " coinage, as intereſted me for him; nor was it a " grave crime in a young bard to have forged falſe " notes of hand, that were to paſs current only in " the pariſh of Parnaſſus. I undeceived him about " my being a perſon of any intereſt, and urged, " that in duty and gratitude to his mother, who had " ſtraitened herſelf to breed him up to a profeſſion, " he ought to labour in it, that in her old age he " might abſolve his filial debt; and I told him, that " when he ſhould have made a fortune, he might " unbend himſelf with the ſtudies conſonant to his " inclinations. I told him alſo, that I had com- " municated his tranſcripts to better judges, and " that they were by no means ſatisfied with the " authenticity of his ſuppoſed MSS. He wrote me " rather a peeviſh anſwer, ſaid he could not conteſt " with a perſon of my learning, (a compliment by " no means due to me, and which I certainly had " not aſſumed, having mentioned my having con- " ſulted abler judges,) maintained the genuineneſs " of the poems, and demanded to have them re- " turned, as they were the property of another Gentle- " man. Remember this.

" When I received this letter, I was going to " Paris in a day or two, and either forgot his re- " queſt of the poems, or perhaps not having time to " have them copied, deferred complying till my re- " turn, which was to be in ſix weeks. I proteſt I " do not remember which was the caſe; and yet, " though in a cauſe of ſo little importance, I will " not utter a ſyllable of which I am not poſitively " certain, nor will charge my memory with a tittle " beyond what it retains. Soon after my return " from France, I received another letter from Chat- " terton, the ſtyle of which was ſingularly impertı- " nent. He demanded his poems roughly; and " added, that I ſhould not have dared to uſe him ſo " ill, if he had not acquainted me with the narrow- " neſs of his circumſtances. My heart did not ac- " cuſe me of inſolence to him. I wrote an anſwer " to him, expoſtulating with him on his injuſtice, " and renewing good advice; but upon ſecond " thoughts, reflecting that ſo wrong-headed a young " man, of whom I knew nothing, and whom I had " never ſeen, might be abſurd enough to print my " letter, I flung it into the fire; and wrapping up " both his poems and letters, without taking a copy " of either, for which I am now ſorry, I returned " all to him, and thought no more about him or " them, till about a year and a half after, when " dining at the Royal Academy, Dr. Goldſmith " drew the attention of the company with an account " of a marvellous treaſure of ancient poems lately " diſcovered at Briſtol, and expreſſed enthuſiaſtic " belief in them, for which he was laughed at by " Dr. Johnſon, who was preſent. I ſoon found this " was the trouvaille of my friend Chatterton; and " I told Dr. Goldſmith that this novelty was none to " me, who might, if I had pleaſed, have had the " honour of uſhering the great diſcovery to the " learned world. You may imagine, Sir, we did " not at all agree in the meaſure of our faith: but " though his credulity diverted me, my mirth was " ſoon daſhed; for on aſking about Chatterton, he " told me he had been in London, and had deſtroyed " himſelf. I heartily wiſhed then that I had been " the dupe of all the poor young man had written to " me; for who would not have his underſtanding " impoſed upon to ſave a fellow being from the ut- " moſt wretchedneſs; deſpair and ſuicide! and a " poor young man, not eighteen, and of ſuch mira- " culous talents; for, dear Sir, if I wanted credu- " lity on one hand, it is ample on the other. Yet " heap all the improbabilities you pleaſe on the head " of Chatterton, the impoſſibility on Rowley's ſide " will remain. An amazing genius for poetry, " which one of them poſſeſſed, might flaſh out in " the darkeſt age; but could Rowley anticipate the " phraſeology of the eighteenth century? His poetic " fire might burſt through the obſtacles of the times; " like Homer, or other original bards, he might " have formed a poetical ſtyle; but would it have " been preciſely that of an age ſubſequent to him by " ſome hundred years? Nobody can admire the " poetry of the poems in queſtion more than I do; " but except being better than moſt modern verſes, " in what do they differ in the conſtruction? The " words are old, the conſtruction evidently of yeſter- " day; and, by ſubſtituting modern words, aye, " ſingle words, to the old, or to thoſe invented by " Chatterton, in what do they differ? Try that " method with any compoſition, even in proſe, of " the reign of Henry VI. and ſee if the conſequence " will be the ſame. But I am getting into the con- " troverſy, inſtead of concluding my narrative, " which indeed is ended."

Whatever imputation might have lain on Mr. Walpole with regard to the treatment of Chatterton, before theſe particulars were known, and this narrative appeared, ſurely there can be no impartial reader of it who will not acquit him of any ill treatment of a perſon who appeared to him in ſo queſtionable a ſhape; and allow that in Mr. Walpole's ſituation, he could ſcarcely have acted otherwiſe than he did. For what was the caſe? A youth of ſixteen years of age, clerk to an Attorney at Briſtol, totally unknown to Mr. Walpole, ſends him a letter, acquainting him that the writer, though bred to the law, had a taſte for politer ſtudies, particularly poetry, and wiſhed to be drawn out of his preſent ſituation, and placed in one more at his eaſe, where he might purſue the ſtudies involved his name and character in diſgrace, and which certainly deprived the world prematurely of his excellent abilities. When or how he was unfortunate enough to receive a tincture of infidelity, we are not informed. Early in the year 1769, it appears from a poem on Happineſs, addreſſed to Mr. Catcott, that he had drank deeply of the poiſoned ſpring: And in the concluſion of a letter to the ſame Gentleman, after he left Briſtol, he thus expreſſes himſelf: "Heaven ſend you the comforts of Chriſtianity; I requeſt them not, for I am no Chriſtian." Infidelity, or ſcepticiſm at leaſt, may be termed the diſeaſe of young, lively, and half-informed minds. There is ſomething like diſcovery in the rejection of truths to which they have been from infancy in trammels. A little learning, too, miſleads the underſtanding, in an opinion of its own powers. When we have acquired the outlines of ſcience, we are apt to ſuppoſe that every thing is within our comprehenſion. Much ſtudy and much information are required to diſcover the difficulties in which the ſyſtems of infidels are involved. There are profound, as well as popular arguments, in favour of revealed religion: but when the flippancy of Voltaire or Hume has taught young perſons to ſuppoſe that they have defeated the former, their underſtandings ſeldom recover ſufficient vigour to purſue the latter with the ability and perſeverance of a Newton or a Bryant.

The evil effect of theſe principles upon the morals of youth, is often found to ſurvive the ſpeculative impreſſions which they have made on the intellect. Wretched is that perſon, who, in the ardour and impetuoſity of youth, finds himſelf releaſed from all the ſalutary reſtraints of duty and religion: wretched is he, who, deprived of all the comforting hopes of another ſtate, is reduced to ſeek for happineſs in the vicious gratifications of ſtudies more congenial to his taſte and genius; but of this taſte and genius he produces no other proof than tranſcripts of ſome old poems, ſaid to have been found at Briſtol, and to be the property of another perſon. Theſe poems being exhibited by Mr. Walpole to Mr. Gray and Mr. Maſon, theſe excellent and impartial judges agreed in opinion that they muſt be modern productions, diſguiſed in antiquated phraſes; and, with regard to a long liſt of Briſtol artiſts, Carvers and Painters, announced alſo as part of this treaſure, Mr. Walpole was as confident that none ſuch ever had any exiſtence, and therefore he could not help concluding that the whole was a fiction, contrived by ſome one or more literary wags, who wiſhed to impoſe on his credulity, and to laugh at him if they ſucceeded; and that Chatterton was only the inſtrument employed to introduce and recommend theſe old writings. His youth and ſituation could not lead Mr. Walpole to ſuppoſe he was himſelf the author and contriver, more eſpecially as he aſſerted them to be the property of a perſon at Briſtol then alive. He had indeed repreſented himſelf as a lover of the muſes, but had given no ſpecimens of his own compoſitions. The kindeſt thing therefore Mr. Walpole could do for a young man in this ſituation, was, after a gentle hint of his ſuſpicions of the authenticity of the poems, to recommend to his correſpondent to purſue the line of buſineſs in which he was placed, as moſt likely to ſecure a decent maintenance for himſelf, and enable him to aſſiſt his mother. However diſappointed Chatterton might have been at the time, and angry with Mr. Walpole for this rebuff, it ſhould ſeem as if he had not harboured any long or ſtrong reſentment againſt that Gentleman; for in a copy of verſes addreſſed to Miſs M. R. and ſent by him to the Town and Country Magazine, and printed in the Number for January 1770, is the following ſtanza:

" Yet when that bloom and dancing fire,
" In ſilver'd reverence ſhall expire,
" Aged, wrinkled, and defac'd,
" To keep one lover's flame alive
" Requires the genius of a Clive,
" With WALPOLE's mental taſte (7)."

(7) See Chatterton's Miſcellanies, p. 88.

It ſhould ſeem alſo, that Chatterton had in part adopted Mr. Walpole's advice, by continuing with his maſter a full twelvemonth after his application to that Gentleman. Then he got diſmiſſed from his maſter and went to London, in full confidence that his literary talents would find ample employment and encouragement from the London Bookſellers; but being diſappointed in his expectation, the fatal concluſion which has juſt been mentioned took place. Had this been the caſe immediately on his receipt of Mr. Walpole's laſt letter, ſome ſhadow of foundation might have appeared for the harſh cenſures paſſed on Mr. Walpole's treatment of this ill-fated youth; though even then, no real one, all circumſtances conſidered.

From the ſpirited reply of Mr. Walpole to one of theſe cenſurers, (the Editor of Chatterton's Miſcellanies,) and printed in the ſame pamphlet as the letter to W. B. the following extract is given, as equally applicable to all objectors.

" Was it the part of a juſt man to couple Chatter-
" ton's firſt unſucceſsful application with his fatal
" exit, and load me with both? Does your enthu-
" ſiaſtic admiration of his abilities, or your regrets
" for the honour of England's poetry, warrant ſuch
" a concatenation of ideas? Was poor Chatterton
" ſo modeſt, or ſo deſponding, as to abandon his " enterprizes on their being damped by me? Did he " not continue to purſue them? Is this country ſo
" deſtitute of patrons of genius, or do I move in ſo
" eminent and diſtinguiſhed a ſphere, that a repulſe
" from me is a dagger to talents? Did not Chatter-
" ton come to London after that miſcarriage? Did
" he relinquiſh his counterfeiting propenſity on its " being loſt on me? Was he an inoffenſive ingenu-
" ous youth, ſmit with the love of the muſes, and
" ſoaring above a ſordid and ſervile profeſſion, whoſe
" early bloſſoms being blighted by my inſolence,
" withered in mortified obſcurity, and on ſeeing his " hopes of fame blaſted, ſunk beneath the frowns of " ignorant and inſolent wealth? or did he, after " launching into all the exceſſes you deſcribe, and
" vainly hoping to gratify his ambition by adulation
" to, or ſatires on all ranks and parties of men, fall
" a victim to his own ungovernable ſpirit, and to
" the deplorable ſtraits to which he had reduced
" himſelf? The interval was ſhort, I own; but as " every moment of ſo extraordinary a life was
" crouded with efforts of his enterpriſing genius,
" allow me to ſay with truth, that there was a large
" chaſm between his application to me and his " miſerable concluſion. You know there was; and
" though my falling into his ſnare might have varied
" the æra of his exploits, it is more likely that that
" ſucceſs would rather have encouraged than checked
" his enterpriſes. When he purſued his turn for " fabricating ancient writings, in ſpite of the mor-
" tification he received from me, it is not probable " that he would have been corrected by ſucceſs:
" ſuch is not the nature of ſucceſs, when it is the " reward of artifice. I ſhould be more juſtly re-
" proachable for having contributed to cheriſh an " impoſtor, than I am for having accelerated his " fate. I cannot repeat the words without emotions
" of indignation on my own account, and of com-

this life; who, under ſuch deluſions, acquires habits of profligacy or diſcontent! The progreſs, however, from ſpeculative to practical irreligion, is not ſo rapid as is commonly ſuppoſed. The greateſt advantage of a ſtrict and orderly education is the reſiſtance which virtuous habits, early acquired, oppoſe to the allurements of vice. Thoſe who have ſullied the youth of Chatterton with the imputation of extraordinary vices or irregularities, and have aſſerted, that "his profligacy was, at leaſt, as conſpicuous as his abilities (a)," have, I conceive, rather grounded theſe aſſertions on the apparently profane and immoral tendency of ſome of his productions, than on perſonal knowledge or a correct review of his conduct. During his reſidence at Briſtol, we have the moſt reſpectable evidence in favour of the regularity of his conduct, namely, that of his maſter, Mr. Lambert. Of few young men in his ſituation it can be ſaid, that during a courſe of nearly three years, he ſeldom encroached upon the ſtrict limits which were aſſigned him, with reſpect to his hours of liberty; that his maſter could never accuſe him of improper behaviour; and that he had the utmoſt reaſon to be ſatisfied he never ſpent his hours of leiſure in any but reſpectable company.

(a) Preface to Chat. Miſcel. p. 18.

Mrs. Newton, with that unaffected ſimplicity which ſo eminently characteriſes her letter, moſt powerfully controverts the obloquy which had been thrown upon her brother's memory. She ſays, that while he was at Mr. Lambert's, he viſited his mother regularly moſt evenings before nine o'clock, and they were ſeldom two evenings together without ſeeing him. He was for a conſiderable time remarkably indifferent to females. He declared to his ſiſter, that he had always ſeen the whole ſex with perfect indifference, except thoſe whom nature had rendered dear. He remarked, at the ſame time, the tendency of ſevere ſtudy to ſour the temper, and indicated his inclination to form an acquaintance with a young female in the neighbourhood, apprehending that it might ſoften that auſterity of temper which had reſulted from ſolitary ſtudy. The juvenile Petrarch wanted a Laura, to poliſh his manners and exerciſe his fancy. He addreſſed a poem to Miſs Rumſey; and they commenced, Mrs. Newton adds, a correſponding acquaintance. "He would alſo frequently," ſhe ſays, "walk the College Green with the young girls that ſtatedly paraded there to ſhew their finery [N];" but ſhe is perſuaded that the reports which charge him with libertiniſm are ill founded [O]. She could not perhaps have added a better proof of it, than his inclination to aſſociate with modeſt women. The teſtimony of Mr. Thiſtlethwaite is not leſs explicit or leſs honourable to Chatterton. "The opportunities," ſays he, "which a long acquaintance with him afforded me, juſtify me in ſaying, that whilſt he lived at Briſtol, he was not the debauched character he has been repreſented. Temperate in his living, moderate in his pleaſures, and regular in his exerciſes, he was undeſerving of the aſperſion. I admit that amongſt his papers may be found many paſſages, not only immoral, but bordering upon a libertiniſm groſs and unpardonable. It is not my intention to attempt a vindication of thoſe paſſages, which, for the regard I bear his memory, I wiſh he had never written, but which I nevertheleſs believe to have originated rather from a warmth of imagination, aided by a vain affectation of ſingularity, than from any natural depravity, or from a heart vitiated by evil example [P]."

But though it may not always be the effect of infidel principles, to plunge the perſon who becomes unfortunately infected with them into an immediate courſe of flagrant and ſhameleſs depravity, they ſeldom fail to unhinge the mind, and render it the ſport of ſome paſſion, unfriendly to our happineſs and proſperity. One of their firſt effects in Chatterton was to render the idea of ſuicide familiar, and to diſpoſe him to think lightly of the moſt

[N] To ſhew their finery.] In a letter from London to his ſiſter, he particularizes ten Briſtol females of his acquaintance, and adds, "I promiſed to write "to ſome hundreds, I believe: but what with writ-"ing for publications, and going to places of public "diverſion, which is as abſolutely neceſſary to me "as my food, I find but little time to write to "you." O.

[O] Which charge him with libertiniſm are ill-founded.] I cannot help remarking a pleaſant miſtake of the Dean of Exeter. The orthography of Mrs. N. in the letter printed in Love and Madneſs, is not the moſt correct. Her words are, "I really believe he was no debauchee (though ſome have reported it); the dear unhappy boy had faults enough, I ſaw with concern; he was proud and exceedingly imperious, but that of venality he could not be juſtly accuſed with." It is eaſy to ſee that Mrs. N. by venality means libertiniſm; but the Dean taking the word in the uſual ſenſe, makes uſe of it to diſprove, what is ſeldom ſuſpected of a Poet, and leaſt of all of Chatterton, that he was avaricious (8).

(8) Mrs. Newton's letter.

[P] Or from a heart vitiated by evil example.] Whether the following paſſage from Chatterton's Kew Gardens (a poem not publiſhed in any of the collections of his works) be received as a confirmation of his friend's teſtimony in his favour, or the contrary, it is, however, worth preſerving. An officious friend is introduced accoſting him in the following lines:

"Is there a ſtreet within this ſpacious place,
"That boaſts the happineſs of one fair face,
"Whoſe converſation does not turn on you?
"Blaming your wild amours, and morals too.
"Oaths, ſacred and tremendous oaths you ſwear,
"Oaths which might ſhock a L——'s ſoul to hear;
"Whilſt the too tender and believing maid,
"Remember pretty——is betray'd.
"Then your religion!—oh, beware! beware!
"Although a Deiſt is no monſter here, ſacred depoſit with which man is entruſted by his Creator. It has been ſuppoſed that his violent death in London, was the ſudden or almoſt inſtant effect of extreme poverty and diſappointment. It appears, however, that long before he left Briſtol, he had repeatedly intimated to the ſervants of Mr. Lambert, his intention of putting an end to his exiſtence. Mr. Lambert's mother was particularly terrified; but ſhe was unable to perſuade her ſon of the reality of his threats, till he found by accident upon his deſk a paper, entitled, the "Laſt Will and Teſtament of Thomas Chatterton (b)," in which he ſeriouſly indicated his deſign of committing ſuicide on the following day, namely, Eaſter Sunday, April 15th, 1770. The paper was probably rather the reſult of temporary uneaſineſs [Q], than of that fixed averſion to his ſituation which he conſtantly manifeſted. But with principles and paſſions ſuch as Chatterton diſplayed, Mr. Lambert conſidered it as no longer prudent, after ſo deciſive a proof, to continue him in the houſe: he accordingly diſmiſſed him immediately from his ſervice, in which he had continued two years, nine months, and thirteen days.

(b) See the Will in the Appendix to Chatterton's Miſc.

If there was any ſincerity in the intentions of committing ſuicide, which he expreſſed in the paper above alluded to, he was diverted from it for the preſent by the golden proſpects with which he flattered himſelf from a new plan of life, on which he entered with his uſual enthuſiaſm. A few months before he left Briſtol, he had written letters to ſeveral Bookſellers in London (c), "who," Mr. Thiſtlethwaite ſays, "finding him of advantage to them in their publications, were by no means ſparing of their praiſes and compliments; adding the moſt liberal promiſes of aſſiſtance and employment, ſhould he chooſe to make London the place of his reſidence (d)." To the interrogatories of this Gentleman concerning the plan of life which he intended to purſue on his arrival at London, his anſwer was remarkable, and correſponds with what has been juſt related. "My firſt attempt," ſaid he, "ſhall be in the literary way: The promiſes I have received are ſufficient to diſpel doubt; but ſhould I, contrary to my expectation, find myſelf deceived, I will in that caſe turn Methodiſt preacher. Credulity is as potent a deity as ever, and a new ſect may eaſily be deviſed. But if that too ſhould fail me, my laſt and final reſource is a piſtol."

(d) Milles's Rowley, p. 460.

Before he quitted Briſtol, he had entered deeply into politics, and had embraced what was termed the patriotic party. In March 1770, he wrote a ſatirical poem, called "Kew Gardens," conſiſting of above thirteen hundred lines. This he tranſmitted, in different packets, to Mr. George William Edmunds, No. 73, Shoe-lane, Printer of a patriotic newſpaper. At the bottom of the firſt packet, which contained about three hundred lines, written in Chatterton's own hand, is this poſtſcript. "Mr. Edmunds will ſend the author, Thomas Chatterton, twenty of the Journals, in which the above poem (which I ſhall continue) ſhall appear, by the machine, if he thinks proper to put it in: the money ſhall be paid to his orders." The poem is a ſatire on the Princeſs Dowager of Wales, Lord Bute, and their Friends in London and Briſtol; but particularly on thoſe in Briſtol, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in favour of the Miniſtry. His ſignature on this occaſion was DECIMUS; but whether the poem was ever printed or not, I have not been able to aſcertain. I have been alſo informed of another political ſatire of near ſix hundred lines, the manuſcript of which, in Chatterton's hand writing, is in the poſſeſſion of a friend of Mr. Catcott. It is called "The Whore of Babylon." The ſatire of this poem is alſo directed againſt the Miniſtry; and, like the former, it includes ſeveral of the Briſtol people, not excepting Mr. George Catcott, and his brother the Clergyman. But his party efforts were not confined altogether to poetry: he wrote an invective in proſe againſt Biſhop Newton, alſo ſigned Decimus, which, I believe, appeared in ſome of the periodical publications of the times. The manuſcript of this letter is in Mr. Catcott's poſſeſſion; but the ſtyle appears much inferior to that of his proſe publications poſterior to his arrival in London. To write well in proſe is perhaps more the effect of art, of ſtudy, and of habit, than of natural genius. The rules of metrical compoſition are fewer, more ſimple, and require a leſs conſtant exerciſe of the judgment. In the infancy of ſocieties, as well as of individuals, therefore, the art of poetry is antecedent to thoſe of rhetoric and criticiſm, and arrives at perfection long before the language of proſe attains that degree of ſtrength, conciſeneſs, and harmony, which is requiſite to ſatisfy a delicate ear. Chatterton wrote alſo an indecent ſatirical poem, called "The Exhibition," occaſioned by the improper behaviour of a perſon in Briſtol. The ſatire of this poem is chiefly local, and the characters of moſt of the Surgeons in Briſtol are delineated in it. Some deſcriptive paſſages in this poem have great merit. Thus, ſpeaking of a favourite organiſt, probably Mr. Allen, he ſays:

"He keeps the paſſions with the ſound in play,
"And the ſoul trembles with the trembling key (e)."

(e) Love and Madneſs, p. 167.

There are a number of other unpubliſhed works of his diſperſed in the hands of different perſons. The activity of his mind is indeed almoſt unparalleled. But our ſurpriſe must decreaſe, when we conſider that he ſlept but little; and that his whole attention was directed to literary purſuits; for he declares himſelf ſo ignorant of his profeſſion, that he was unable to draw out a clearance from his apprenticeſhip, which Mr. Lambert demanded (f). He was alſo unfettered by the ſtudy of the dead languages, which uſually abſorb much of the time and attention of young perſons; and though they may be uſeful to the attainment of correctneſs, perhaps they do not much contribute to fluency in writing. Mr. Catcott declared, that when he firſt knew Chatterton, he was ignorant even of Grammar (g).

[Q] The paper was probably rather the reſult of temporary uneaſineſs.] I have been informed from good authority, that it was occaſioned by the refuſal of a Gentleman, whom he had occaſionally complimented in his poems, to accommodate him with a ſupply of money.

(f) See the third letter of Chatterton, publiſhed in Love and Madneſs, p. 198.

(g) From the information of Mr. Seward.

There are three great æras in the life of Chatterton; his admiſſion into Colſton's School, his being put apprentice to Mr. Lambert, and his expedition to London. In the latter end of April, 1770, he bade his native city (from which he had never previouſly been abſent farther than he could walk in half a Sunday) a final adieu (h). In a letter to his mother, dated April 26th, he deſcribes in a lively ſtyle the little adventures of his journey, and his reception from his patrons, the bookſellers and printers with whom he had correſponded. Theſe were Mr. Edmunds, whom I lately had occaſion to mention as a noted patriotic printer at that period; Mr. Fell, publiſher of the Freeholder's Magazine; Mr. Hamilton, proprietor of the Town and Country; and Mr. Dodſley, of Pall-Mall. From all of them he profeſſes to have received great encouragement, adding, that all approved of his deſign, and that he ſhould probably be ſoon ſettled. In the ſame letter, he deſires his mother to call upon Mr. Lambert. "Shew him this," ſays he, with uncommon dignity and ſpirit, "or tell him, if I deſerve a recommendation, he would oblige me to give me one—if I do not, it would be beneath him to take notice of me (i)."

(h) Love and Madneſs, p. 191.

(i) Love and Madneſs, p. 192.

His firſt habitation after his arrival in London was at Mr. Walmſley's, a plaiſterer in Shoreditch, to whom he was introduced by a relation of his, a Mrs. Ballance, who reſided in the ſame houſe. Of his firſt eſtabliſhment his report is favourable. "I am ſettled," ſays he, in a letter to his mother, dated May 6th, "and in ſuch a ſettlement as I could deſire. I get four guineas a month by one magazine; ſhall engage to write a hiſtory of England, and other pieces, which will more than double that ſum. Occaſional eſſays for the daily papers would more than ſupport me. What a glorious proſpect (k)!" In conſequence of his engagements with the different magazines, we find him, about the ſame time, ſoliciting communications from his poetical and literary friends at Briſtol, and deſiring them to read the Freeholder's Magazine. In a letter dated the 14th of the ſame month, he writes in the ſame high flow of ſpirits. He ſpeaks of the great encouragement which genius meets with in London; adding, with exultation, "If Rowley had been a "Londoner inſtead of a Briſtowyan, I might have lived by copying his works (l)." He exhorts his ſiſter to "improve in copying muſic, drawing, and every thing which requires genius;" obſerving, that although, "in Briſtol's mercantile ſtyle, thoſe things may be uſeleſs, if not a detriment to her; here they are profitable (m)." His engagements at that period indeed appear to have been numerous; for beſides his employment in the magazines, he ſpeaks of a connection which he had formed with a Doctor in Muſic, to write ſongs for Ranelagh, Vauxhall, &c. and in a letter of the 30th to his ſiſter, he mentions another with a Scottiſh Bookſeller, to compile a voluminous Hiſtory of London, to appear in numbers, for which he was to have his board at the Bookſeller's houſe, and a handſome premium [R].

(k) Ibid. 197.

(m) Love and Madneſs, p. 201.

Party writing, however, ſeems to have been one of his favourite employments. It was agreeable to the ſatirical turn of his diſpoſition, and it gratified his vanity, by the proſpect of elevating him into immediate notice. When his relation, Mrs. Ballance, recommended it to him to endeavour to get into ſome office, he ſtormed like a madman, and alarmed the good old Lady in no inconſiderable degree, by telling her, "he hoped, with the bleſſing of God, very ſoon to be ſent priſoner to the Tower, which would make his fortune." In his ſecond letter to his mother from London, he ſays, "Mr. Wilkes knew me by my writings, ſince I firſt correſponded with the Bookſellers here. I ſhall viſit him next week, and by his intereſt will inſure Mrs. Ballance the Trinity Houſe. He affirmed that what Mr. Fell had of mine could not be the writings of a youth, and expreſſed a deſire to know the author. By means of another Bookſeller, I ſhall be introduced to Townſhend and Sawbridge. I am quite familiar at the Chapter Coffee-houſe, and know all the geniuſſes there. A character is now unneceſſary; an author carries his character in his pen (n)." He informs his ſiſter that, if money flowed as faſt upon him as honours, he would give her a portion of five thouſand pounds. This extraordinary elevation of ſpirits aroſe from an introduction to the celebrated patriotic Lord Mayor, W. Beckford. Chatterton had, it ſeems, addreſſed an eſſay to him, which was ſo well received, that it encouraged him to wait upon his Lordſhip, in order to obtain his approbation to addreſs a ſecond letter to him, on the ſubject of the city remonſtrance, and its reception. "His Lordſhip (adds he) received me as politely as a citizen could, and warmly invited me to call on him again. The reſt is a ſecret." His inclination doubtleſs led him to eſpouſe the party of oppoſition; but he complains, that "no money is to be got on that ſide the queſtion; intereſt is on the other ſide. But he is a poor author who cannot write on both ſides. I believe I may be introduced (and if I am not, I'll introduce myſelf) to a ruling power in the Court party (o)." When Beckford died, he is ſaid to have been almoſt frantic (p), and to have exclaimed, that he was ruined. The elegy, however, in which he has celebrated him (q), contains more of frigid praiſe, than of ardent feeling; nor is there in it a ſingle line which appears to flow from the heart. Indeed, that he was ſerious in his intention of writing on both ſides, is evident from a liſt of pieces written by Chatterton, but never publiſhed, which Mr. Walpole has preſerved. No. V. of theſe pieces is a letter to Lord North, dated May 26th, 1770, ſigned Moderator, and beginning, "My Lord, It gives me a painful pleaſure, &c." It contains, as Mr. Walpole informs us, an encomium on Adminiſtration for rejecting the City Remonſtrance. On the other hand, No. VI. is a letter to the Lord Mayor, Beckford, (probably that which he deſired his permiſſion to addreſs to him). It is alſo dated May 26, ſigned Probus, and contains a virulent invective againſt Government for rejecting the Remonſtrance, beginning, "When the endeavours of a ſpirited people to free themſelves from inſupportable ſlavery, &c." On the back of this eſſay, which is directed to Mr. Cary, a particular friend of Chatterton in Briſtol, is this indorſement: "Accepted by Bingley—ſet for, and thrown out of the North Briton, 21ſt June, on account of the Lord Mayor's death.

"Eſſays," again ſays he to his ſiſter, "on the patriotic ſide, fetch no more than what the copy is ſold for. As the patriots themſelves are ſearching for a place, they have no gratuities to ſpare. On the other hand, unpopular eſſays will not even be accepted, and you muſt pay to have them printed; but then you ſeldom loſe by it. Courtiers are ſo ſenſible of their deficiency in merit, that they generally reward all who know how to daub them with an appearance of it (s)." Either Chatterton, on this occaſion, ſpoke from hear-ſay, or there is reaſon to believe that the miniſterial arrangements are greatly altered in this reſpect, and that moſt of the late adminiſtrations have found a more effectual, if a more expenſive ſupport, from a venal majority in the Houſe, than from a venal phalanx of mendicant authors in the daily papers.

On this ſandy foundation of party writing Chatterton erected a viſionary fabric of future greatneſs; and, in the waking dreams of a poetical imagination, he was already a man of conſiderable public importance. It was a common aſſertion with him, "that he would ſettle the nation before he had done (t)." In a letter to his ſiſter of the 20th July, he tells her, "My company is courted every where; and, could I humble myſelf to go into a compter, could have had twenty places before now; but I muſt be among the great; ſtate matters ſuit me better than commercial (u)." In a former letter he intimates, that he "might have had a recommendation to Sir George Colebrooke, an Eaſt-India Director, as qualified for an office no ways deſpicable, but," he adds, "I ſhall not take a ſtep to the ſea, whilſt I can continue on land (w)." His taſte for diſſipation ſeems to have kept pace with the increaſe of his vanity (x). To frequent places of public amuſement, he accounts as neceſſary to him as food. "I employ my money," ſays he, "now in fitting myſelf faſhionably, and getting into good company: this laſt article always brings me in intereſt (y)."

While engaged in the examination of theſe curious letters, it is impoſſible not to be attracted by a remarkable paſſage. Chatterton informs his mother in the letter of May 14th, A Gentleman, who knows me at the Chapter, as an author, would have introduced me as a companion to the young Duke of Northumberland, in his intended general tour; but, alas! I ſpeak no tongue but my own (z)." It is not very credible, that any of the conſtant frequenters of the Chapter Coffee-houſe ſhould be poſſeſſed of influence ſufficient to recommend a perſon to the Duke of Northumberland, to ſo important an office as that of the care of his ſon; much leſs credible is it, that ſuch a perſon would recommend a young literary adventurer, whoſe character was only known by an accidental meeting at a coffee-houſe; and leaſt credible of all is it, that ſuch a perſon was likely to be accepted on ſo ſlender a ground of recommendation. It is no unfrequent ſport with little minds to play with the ſanguine tempers and expectations of young and unexperienced minds. Poor Chatterton had tolerable experience of theſe prodigal promiſers, from the patriotic Beckford to his pretended patron at the Chapter Coffee-houſe.

The

The ſplendid viſions of promotion and conſequence however ſoon vaniſhed, and our adventurer found no patrons but the bookſellers; and even here he ſeems not to have eſcaped the poignant ſting of diſappointment. Soon after his arrival in London, he writes to his mother, "The poverty of authors is a common obſervation, but not always a true one. No author can be poor who underſtands the arts of bookſellers: without this neceſſary knowledge the greateſt genius may ſtarve, and with it the greateſt dunce may live in ſplendour. This knowledge I have pretty well dipped into (a)." This knowledge, however, inſtead of conducting to opulence and independence, proved a deluſive guide; and though he boaſts of having pieces in the month of June 1770 in the Goſpel Magazine, the Town and Country, the Court and City, the London, the Political Regiſter, &c. and that almoſt the whole Town and Country for the following month was his (b), yet it appears, ſo ſcanty is the remuneration for thoſe periodical labours, that even theſe uncommon exertions of induſtry and genius were inſufficient to ward off the approach of poverty; and he ſeems to have ſunk almoſt at once from the higheſt elevation of hope and illuſion, to the depths of deſpair. Early in July he removed his lodgings from Shoreditch to Mrs. Angel's, a Sack-maker, in Brook-ſtreet, Holborn. Mr. Walmſley's family affirmed that he aſſigned no reaſon for quitting their houſe. The author of Love and Madneſs attributes the change to the neceſſity he was under, from the nature of his employments, of frequenting public places (c). Is it not probable that he might remove, leſt his friends in Shoreditch, who had heard his frequent boaſts, and obſerved his dream of greatneſs, ſhould be the ſpectators of his approaching indigence? Pride was the ruling paſſion of Chatterton, and a too acute ſenſe of ſhame is ever found to accompany literary pride. But however he might be deſirous of preſerving appearances to the world, he was ſufficiently lowered in his own expectations; and great indeed muſt have been his humiliation, when we find his towering ambition reduced to the miſerable hope of ſecuring the very ineligible appointment of a ſurgeon's mate to Africa. To his friend Mr. Barrett he applied, in his diſtreſs, for a recommendation to this unpromiſing ſtation. Even in this dreary proſpect he was not, however, without the conſolations of his muſe. His fancy delighted itſelf with the expectation of contemplating the wonders of a country, where "Nature flouriſhes in her moſt perfect vigour; where the purple aloe, and the ſcarlet jeſſamine, diffuſe their rich perfumes; where the reeking tygers baſk in the ſedges, or wanton with their ſhadows in the ſtream (d)."

(a) Love and Madneſs, p. 195.

(c) Love and Madneſs, p. 189.

His reſolution was announced in a poem to Miſs Buſh (e), in the ſtyle of Cowley, that is, with too much affectation of wit for real feeling. Probably, indeed, when he compoſed the African Eclogues, which was juſt before, he might not be without a diſtant contemplation of a ſimilar deſign; and perhaps we are to attribute a part of the exulting expreſſions, which occur in the letters to his mother and ſiſter, to the kind and laudable intention of making them happy with reſpect to his proſpects in life; ſince we find him, almoſt at the very criſis of his diſtreſs, ſending a number of little unneceſſary preſents to them and his grandmother [S], while perhaps he was himſelf almoſt in want of the neceſſaries of life.

(e) Chat. Miſc. p. 85.

On the ſcore of incapacity probably, Mr. Barrett refuſed him the neceſſary recommendation, and his laſt hope was blaſted [T]. Of Mrs. Angel, with whom he laſt reſided, no enquiries have afforded any ſatisfactory intelligence; but there can be little doubt that his death was preceded by extreme indigence. Mr. Croſs, an Apothecary in Brook-ſtreet, informed Mr. Warton, that while Chatterton lived in the neighbourhood, he frequently called at the ſhop, and was repeatedly preſſed by Mr. Croſs to dine or ſup with him in vain. One evening, however, human frailty ſo far prevailed over his dignity, as to tempt him to partake of the regale of a barrel of oyſters, when he was obſerved to eat moſt voraciouſly (f). Mrs. Wolfe, a Barber's wife, within a few doors of the houſe where Mrs. Angel lived, has alſo afforded ample teſtimony, both to his poverty and his pride. She ſays, "that Mrs. Angel told her, after his death, that on the 24th of Auguſt, as ſhe knew he had not eaten any thing for two or three days, ſhe begged he would take ſome dinner with her; but he was offended at her expreſſions, which ſeemed to hint he was in want, and aſſured her he was not hungry (g)." In theſe deſperate circumſtances, his mind reverted to what (we learn from Mr. Thiſtlethwaite, and other quarters) he had accuſtomed himſelf to regard as a laſt reſource.—"Over his death, for the ſake of the [S] Sending a number of little unneceſſary preſents to them and his grandmother.] They ſeem to have been trifling preſents, and thoſe not ſent when he was in want (11). As ſoon as he felt himſelf in that ſtate he preſently diſpatched himſelf; that is, ſix weeks after he had ſent theſe preſents.

(11) His proſpects were then of the moſt flattering kind. See his laſt letter to his ſiſter.

There has been too much flouriſhing about theſe preſents and affection to his relations. When a man ſuffers from pain of body or mind, and is tempted in conſequence thereof to commit ſuicide, the ſtrongeſt motives to reſtrain him are the proſpect and fear of puniſhment in the next world, and a love of, and regard to, his family, relations, and friends in this. The former C. ſeems to have entirely diſcarded. O.

[T] And his laſt hope was blaſted.] This circumſtance reflects no diſgrace, but rather honour upon Mr. B. as he could not poſſibly foreſee the melancholy conſequence, and he could not in conſcience be the inſtrument of committing the lives of a conſiderable number of perſons to one totally inadequate to the charge.

world," says the author of Love and Madness, "I would willingly draw a veil. But this must not be. They who are in a condition to patronise merit, and they who feel a consciousness of merit which is not patronised, may form their own resolutions from the catastrophe of his tale;—those, to lose no opportunity of befriending genius; these, to seize every opportunity of befriending themselves, and, upon no account, to harbour the most distant idea of quitting the world, however it may be unworthy of them, lest despondency should at last deceive them into so unpardonable a step. Chatterton, as appears by the Coroner's Inquest, swallowed arsenick in water, on the 24th of August, 1770, and died in consequence thereof the next day. He was buried in a shell, in the burying ground of Shoe-lane work-house (b)." Whatever unfinished pieces he might have, he cautiously destroyed them before his death; and his room, when broken open, was found covered with little scraps of paper (i). What must increase our regret for this hasty and unhappy step, is the information that the late Dr. Fry, Head of St. John's College in Oxford, went to Bristol in the latter end of August 1770, in order to search into the history of Rowley and Chatterton, and to patronise the latter, if he appeared to deserve assistance—when, alas! all the intelligence he could procure was, that Chatterton had, within a few days, destroyed himself (k).

(b) Ibid. p. 221.

(i) Ibid. p. 222.

(k) Ibid. p. 226.

I have been induced, from the circumstances of the narrative, repeatedly to consider the character of Chatterton in the different stages of life in which I had occasion to contemplate him. Indeed, the character of any man is better understood from a fair and accurate statement of his life and conduct, than from the comments of any critic or biographer whatever. A few general observations, which could not with so much propriety be introduced into the body of the narrative, I shall, however, venture to subjoin; though I flatter myself the reader is not at this time unacquainted with the outline of his moral portrait.

The person of Chatterton, like his genius, was premature. He had a manliness and dignity beyond his years, and there was a something about him uncommonly prepossessing. His most remarkable feature was his eyes, which, though gray, were uncommonly piercing: when he was warmed in argument, or otherwise, they sparked with fire, and one eye, it is said, was still more remarkable than the other (l). His genius will be most completely estimated from his writings. He had an uncommon ardour in the pursuit of knowledge, and uncommon facility in the attainment of it. It was a favourite maxim with him, that "man is equal to any thing, and that every thing might be atchieved by diligence and abstinence [T]." His imagination, like Dryden's, was more fertile than correct; and he seems to have erred rather through haste and negligence, than through any deficiency of taste. He was above that puerile affectation which pretends to borrow nothing. He knew that original genius consists in forming new and happy combinations, rather than in searching after thoughts and ideas which never had occurred before; and that the man who never imitated, has seldom acquired a habit of good writing. If those poems, which pass under the name of Rowley, be really the productions of Chatterton, he possessed the strongest marks of a vigorous imagination and a sound judgment, in forming great, consistent, and ingenious plots, and making choice of the most interesting subjects. If Rowley and Chatterton be the same, it will be difficult to say whether he excelled most in the sublime or the satirical; and as an universal genius, he must rank above Dryden, and perhaps only stand second to Shakespeare. If, on the other hand, we are to judge altogether from those pieces which are confessedly his own, we must undoubtedly assign the preference to those of the satirical class. In most of his serious writings, there is little that indicates their being composed with a full relish: when he is satirical, his soul glows in his composition.

Mr. Catcott affirms that Chatterton understood no language but his mother tongue. The same fact seems to be implied in his own confession, "that he spoke no tongue but his own (m); and it receives decisive confirmation from the testimony of Mr. Smith, in his conversation with Dr. Glynn: yet we find him, even so early as the year 1768, annexing a Latin signature to the "Accounte of the Fryers passing the old Bridge;" and there are some attempts at inscriptions in old French, in the design which he planned for his own tomb-stone (n). He, probably, might have acquired some little knowledge of both these languages; but even if this were the case, there can be no doubt that it was very superficial. When we consider the variety of his engagements while at Bristol, his extensive reading, and the great knowledge he had acquired of the ancient language of his native country, we cannot wonder that he had not time to occupy himself in the study of other languages; and after his arrival in London, he had a new and necessary science to learn, the world: and that he made the most advantageous use of his time is evident from the extensive knowledge of mankind displayed in the different essays, which he produced occaſionally for periodical publications. The lively and vigorous imagination of Chatterton contributed, doubtleſs, to animate him with that ſpirit of enterpriſe, which led him to form ſo many impracticable and viſionary ſchemes, for the acquiſition of fame and fortune. His ambition was evident from his earlieſt youth; and perhaps the inequality of his ſpirits might, in a great meaſure, depend upon the fairneſs of his views, or the diſſipation of his projects. His melancholy was extreme on ſome occaſions; and, at thoſe times, he conſtantly argued in favour of ſuicide. Mr. Catcott left him one evening totally depreſſed; but he returned the next morning with unuſual ſpirits. He ſaid, "he had ſprung a mine," and produced a parchment, containing the Sprytes, a poem, now in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Barrett (o).

[T] And that every thing might be atchieved by diligence and abstinence.] If any uncommon character was mentioned in his hearing, "All boy as he was, he would only observe, that the person in question merited praise; but that God had sent his creatures into the world with arms long enough to reach any thing, if they would be at the trouble of extending them (11)."

(o) From the information of Mr. Seward.

His natural melancholy was not corrected by the irreligious principles which he had ſo unfortunately imbibed. To theſe we are certainly to attribute his premature death; and, if he can be proved guilty of the licentiouſneſs which is by ſome laid to his charge, it is reaſonable to believe that a ſyſtem, which exonerates the mind from the apprehenſion of future puniſhment, would not contribute much to reſtrain the criminal exceſſes of the paſſions. Had Chatterton lived, and been fortunate enough to fall into ſettled and ſober habits of life, his excellent underſtanding would, in all probability, have led him to ſee the fallacy of thoſe principles, which he had haſtily embraced: as it was, the only preſervatives of which he was poſſeſſed againſt the contagion of vice, were the enthuſiaſm of literature, and that delicacy of ſentiment which taſte and reading inſpire. But though theſe auxiliaries are not wholly to be deſpiſed, we have too many inſtances of their inefficacy in ſupporting the cauſe of virtue, to place any confident reliance on them.

Under ſuch circumſtances there is little cauſe for ſurprize, if the paſſions of Chatterton ſhould frequently have treſpaſſed the boundaries of reaſon and moral duty. That he had ſtrong reſentments is evident from his great diſpoſition to ſatire, and particularly from the letter which has been mentioned as written by him to his ſchool-maſter, ſoon after the commencement of his apprenticeſhip. That he was "proud and imperious," is allowed by his ſiſter, and the generality of his acquaintance. He ſtands charged with a profligate attachment to women: the accuſation, however, is ſtated in a vague and deſultory manner, as if from common report, without any direct or decided evidence in ſupport of the opinion. To the regularity of his conduct during his reſidence in Briſtol, ſome reſpectable teſtimonies have been already exhibited. It is, indeed, by no means improbable, that a young man of ſtrong paſſions, and unprotected by religious principles, might frequently be unprepared to reſiſt the temptations of a licentious metropolis: yet, even after his arrival in London, there are ſome proofs in his favour, which ought not to be diſregarded. During a reſidence of nine weeks at Mr. Walmſley's, he never ſtaid out beyond the family hours, except one night, when Mrs. Ballance knew that he lodged at the houſe of a relation (p).

(p) Love and Madneſs, p. 261.

Whatever may be the truth of theſe reports, the liſt of his virtues ſtill appears to exceed the catalogue of his faults. His temperance was in ſome reſpects exemplary. He ſeldom eat animal food, and never taſted any ſtrong or ſpirituous liquors: he lived chiefly on a morſel of bread or a tart, with a draught of water. His ſiſter affirms, that he was a lover of truth from the earlieſt dawn of reaſon; and that his ſchool-maſter depended on his veracity on all occaſions (q): the pride of genius will ſeldom deſcend to the moſt contemptible of vices, falſehood. His high ſenſe of dignity has been already noticed in two moſt ſtriking inſtances; but the moſt amiable feature in his character, was his generoſity and attachment to his mother and relations. Every favourite project for his advancement in life was accompanied with promiſes and encouragement to them. While in London, he continued to ſend them preſents, at a time when he was known himſelf to be in want: and indeed, the unremitting attention, kindneſs and reſpect, which appear in the whole of his conduct towards them, are deſerving the imitation of thoſe in more fortunate circumſtances, and under the influence of better principles of faith than Chatterton poſſeſſed [U].

(q) Mrs. N.'s letter, ibid.

He had a number of friends, and notwithſtanding his diſpoſition to ſatire, he is ſcarcely known to have had any enemies. By the accounts of all who were acquainted with him, there was ſomething uncommonly inſinuating in his manner and converſation. Mr. Croſs informed Mr. Warton, that in Chatterton's frequent viſits while he reſided at Brook-ſtreet, he found his converſation, a little infidelity excepted, moſt captivating (r). His extenſive, though in many inſtances, ſuperficial knowledge, united with his genius, wit and fluency, muſt have admirably accompliſhed him for the pleaſures of ſociety. His pride, which perhaps ſhould rather be termed the ſtrong conſciouſneſs of intellectual excellence, did not deſtroy his affability. He was always acceſſible, and rather forward to make acquaintance, than apt to decline the advances of others [X]. There is reaſon however to believe,

(r) Warton's Inquiry, p. 107.

[U] Of better principles of faith than Chatterton poſſeſſed.] It can never be ſufficiently lamented, that this amiable propenſity was not more uniform in Chatterton. A real love for his relations ought to have arreſted the hand of ſuicide; but when religion is loſt, all uniformity of principle is loſt. O.

[X] Than apt to decline the advances of others.] "Laſt week being in the pit of Drury-Lane Theatre, "I contracted an immediate acquaintance (which "you know is no hard taſk to me) with a young "Gentleman, &c. (12)."

that that the inequality of his ſpirits, affected greatly his behaviour in company. His fits of abſence were frequent and long. "He would often look ſtedfaſtly in a perſon's face without ſpeaking, or ſeeming to ſee the perſon, for a quarter of an hour or more (s)."

Chatterton had one ruling paſſion which governed his whole conduct, and that was the deſire of literary fame. This paſſion intruded itſelf on every occaſion, and abſorbed his whole attention. Whether he would have continued to improve, or the contrary, muſt have depended in ſome meaſure on the circumſtances of his future life. Had he fallen into profligate habits and connections, he would probably have loſt a great part of his ardour for the cultivation of his mind; and his maturer age would only have diminiſhed the admiration which the efforts of his childhood have ſo juſtly excited.

At the ſhrine of Chatterton, ſome grateful incenſe has been offered. Mr. Warton ſpeaks of him as "a prodigy of genius," as "a ſingular inſtance of a prematurity of abilities." He adds, that "he poſſeſſed a comprehenſion of mind, and an activity of underſtanding, which predominated over his ſituation in life, and his opportunities of inſtruction (t)." And Mr. Malone "believes him to have been the greateſt genius that England has produced ſince the days of Shakeſpeare (u)." Mr. Croft (w), the ingenious author of Love and Madneſs, to whom in the courſe of this work I have had many obligations, is ſtill more unqualified in his praiſes. He aſſerts, that "no ſuch human being, at any period of life, has ever been known, or poſſibly ever will be known." He adds, in another place, "an army of Macedonian and Swediſh mad butchers, indeed, fly before him; nor does my memory ſupply me with any human being, who, at ſuch an age, with ſuch diſadvantages, has produced ſuch compoſitions [Y]. Under the Heathen mythology, ſuperſtition and admiration would have explained all by bringing Apollo upon earth: nor would the god ever have deſcended with more credit to himſelf."

The following parallel alſo by the ſame ingenious critic, does equal credit to the ingenuity of its author, and the reputation of Chatterton.

"Milton enjoyed every advantage not only of private, but of public, not only of domeſtic, but of foreign education.

"Milton in his youth received ſuch inſtructions from Teachers and Schoolmaſters, that, in his age, he was able to become a Schoolmaſter, and a Teacher to others.

"Milton's juvenile writings would not have juſtified a prophecy of Paradiſe Loſt: but the author of them flatters himſelf, by dating his life fifteen till he had turned ſixteen.

"Milton did not produce Comus much earlier than in his 26th year; ſince it was firſt preſented at Ludlow in 1634, and he was born in 1608. In 1645, when he was thirty-ſeven, Allegro and Penſeroſo, firſt appeared. In 1655, when he was forty-ſeven, after long chooſing, and beginning late, he ſet himſelf to turn a ſtrange thing, called a Myſtery, into an epic poem; which was not completed in leſs than Chatterton's whole active exiſtence, ſince the copy was not ſold till April, 1667, and then conſiſted only of ten books. With all its glorious perfections, Paradiſe Loſt contains puerilities, to which Chatterton was a ſtranger. In three years more, when he was ſixty-two, appeared Milton's Hiſtory of England. Paradiſe Regained, and Sampſon, were publiſhed in "Chatterton wanted every advantage of every poſſible education.

"Chatterton became his own Teacher and his own Schoolmaſter before other children are ſubjects for inſtruction; and never knew any other.

"Few, if any, of Milton's juvenile writings would have been owned by Chatterton, at leaſt by Rowley, could he have paſt for the author of them.

"Chatterton, not ſuffered to be long chooſing, or to begin late, in ſeventeen years and nine months, reckoning from his cradle to his grave, produced the volume of Rowley's poems, his volume of Miſcellanies, and many things which are not printed, beſide what his indignation tore in pieces the day he ſpurned at the world, and threw himſelf on the anger of his Creator.

[Y] Has produced ſuch compoſitions.] "Mohammed, it is true, ſays Mr. Croft, with hardly the uſual education of his illiterate tribe, unable (as was imagined, and he pretended) even to read or write, forged the KORAN; which is to this day the moſt elegant compoſition in the Arabic language, and its ſtandard of excellence. Upon the argument of improbability, that a man ſo illiterate ſhould compoſe a book ſo admired, Mohammed artfully reſted the principal evidence of his Koran's divinity (13). He, who, merely from improbability, denies Chatterton to be the author of Rowley's Poems, muſt go near to admit God to be the author of the Koran. But, before we compare together Chatterton and Mohammed, it ſhould be remembered that Mohammed was forty when he commenced prophet. Perhaps the moſt extraordinary circumſtance about Mohammed is, that even familiarity could not ſink him into contempt; that he contrived to be a hero and a prophet, even to his wives and his valets de chambre. Even his fits of the epilepſy he converted into proofs of his divine miſſion. It is probable, that, if Mohammed had been leſs ſalacious, and not ſubject to the falling ſickneſs, out of thirty equal diviſions of the known world, whereof Chriſtianity claims five, and Paganiſm nineteen, the inhabitants of ſix would not now believe in the Koran."

What

the ſame year. Lycidas I had forgotten. It was written in his 29th year. That propriety of character and ſituation, which Chatterton can ſeldom have violated, or he would not to this moment deceive ſuch and ſo many men, Milton ſeldom preſerves in Lycidas. If, in the courſe of an exiſtence almoſt four times longer than Chatterton's, this man (fallen on evil days and evil tongues, with leſs truth than Chatterton), who bore no fruit worth gathering till after the age at which Chatterton was withered by the hand of Death—if, I ſay, this great man produced other writings, he will not quarrel that poſterity has forgotten them: if he ſhould, poſterity will ſtill perhaps forget them.

" Milton's manuſcripts, preſerved at Cambridge, bear teſtimony to his frequent and commendable correction.

" What time could Chatterton have found for alteration or correction, when I maintain that any boy who ſhould only have fairly tranſcribed, before his eighteenth year, all that Chatterton, before his eighteenth year, invented and compoſed, would be thought to deſerve the reputation of diligence, and the praiſe of application?

" Milton, as Ellwood relates, could never bear to hear Paradiſe Loſt preferred before Paradiſe Regained. He is known to have pronounced Dryden to be no Poet.

" If Chatterton, much earlier in life than Milton was calculated either to be an author or a critick, had not poſſeſſed a chaſter judgment, he would not ſtill impoſe on ſo many criticks and authors.

" Milton, more from inclination than want of bread, it ſeems, entered into party diſputes, whether a king might be lawfully beheaded, &c. with a ſervility and a virulence, and let out his praiſe to hire, perhaps, with a meanneſs, at all periods of his life, which the worſt enemies of Chatterton cannot prove him to have equalled.

" Chatterton, in order to procure bread for himſelf, a grandmother, mother and ſiſter, was ready to prove the patriotiſm of Bute, or of Beckford, in writings, which older men need not bluſh to own, and in an age when older men did not bluſh at ſuch a profeſſion.

" Milton, in affluence (if compared with others beſide Chatterton) felt on his brows thoſe laurels which others could not ſee; and was perſuaded that, " by labour and intenſe " ſtudy, his portion in this life, he might " leave ſomething ſo written to after-times, " as they ſhould not willingly let it die."

" Chatterton, ſteeped to the lips in poverty, entertained, long before he had lived eighteen years, ideas, hopes, perſuaſions, (by labour and intenſe ſtudy, more truly his portion in this life than Milton's) of living to all eternity in the memory of Fame.

" Paradiſe Loſt produced the author and the widow only twenty-eight pounds. The meaner, more ſervile, and more verſatile abilities of the author produced him indeed enough to be deprived of four thouſand pounds by ill-fortune, and to leave fifteen hundred pounds to his family.

" Mr. Catcott and Mr. Barrett muſt inform the world whether Rowley's poems and his own together produced Chatterton twenty-eight ſhillings.

" Phillips relates of Milton, from his own mouth, that " his vein never happily flowed " but from the autumnal equinox to the " vernal." Richardſon writes, that " his " poetical faculty would on a ſudden ruſh " upon him with an impetus or æſtrum."

" What is ſaid of Chatterton, and of the moon's effect upon him, you have read.

" Milton, when a man, ſeldom drank any thing ſtrong: he ate with delicacy and temperance.

" Chatterton, when a boy, hardly ever touched meat, and drank only water: when a child, he would often refuſe to take any thing but bread and water, even if it did happen that his mother had a hot meal, " becauſe he had a work in hand, and he " muſt not make himſelf more ſtupid than " God had made him."

" Milton's hiſtorians and grand-daughter admit his moroſeneſs to his children, and that he would not let them learn to write."

" Chatterton's mother, his ſiſter and his letters, can ſpeak beſt of his heart, and of his wiſhes that his ſiſter might learn every thing."

To theſe I ſhall add the teſtimony of Mr. Knox:

" Unfortunate boy! ſhort and evil were thy days, but thy fame ſhall be immortal. Hadſt thou been known to the munificent patrons of genius—" Unfortunate boy! poorly waſt thou accommodated during thy ſhort ſojourning among us;—rudely waſt thou treated,—ſorely did thy feeling ſoul ſuffer from the ſcorn of the unworthy; and there are, at laſt, thoſe who wiſh to rob thee of thy only meed, thy poſthumous glory. Severe too are the cenſurers of thy morals. In the gloomy moments of deſpondency, I fear thou haſt uttered impious and blaſphemous thoughts, which none can defend, and which neither thy youth, nor thy fiery ſpirit, nor thy ſituation, can excuſe. But let thy more rigid cenſors reflect, that thou waſt literally and ſtrictly but a boy. Let many of thy bittereſt enemies reflect what were their own religious principles, and whether they had any, at the age of fourteen, fifteen, and ſixteen. Surely it is a ſevere and an unjuſt ſurmiſe, that thou wouldeſt probably have ended thy life as a victim of the laws, if thou hadſt not finiſhed it as thou didſt; ſince the very act by which thou durſt put an end to thy painful exiſtence, proves that thou thoughteſt it better to die, than to ſupport life by theft or violence.

" The ſpeculative errors of a boy who wrote from the ſudden ſuggeſtions of paſſion or deſpondency, who is not convicted of any immoral or diſhoneſt act in conſequence of his ſpeculations, ought to be conſigned to oblivion. But there ſeems to be a general and inveterate diſlike to the boy, excluſively of the poet; a diſlike which many will be ready to impute, and, indeed, not without the appearance of reaſon, to that inſolence and envy of the little great, which cannot bear to acknowledge ſo tranſcendent and commanding a ſuperiority in the humble child of want and obſcurity.

" Malice, if there was any, may ſurely now be at reſt; for " Cold he lies in the grave below." But where were ye, O ye friends to genius, when, ſtung with diſappointment, diſtreſſed for food and raiment, with every frightful form of human miſery painted on his fine imagination, poor Chatterton ſunk in deſpair? Alas! ye knew him not then, and now it is too late,—

For now he is dead;
Gone to his death bed,
All under the willow tree.

So ſang the ſweet youth, in as tender an elegy as ever flowed from a feeling heart.

" In return for the pleaſure I have received from thy poems, I pay thee, poor boy, the trifling tribute of my praiſe. Thyſelf thou haſt emblazoned; thine own monument thou haſt erected: But they whom thou haſt delighted, feel a pleaſure in vindicating thine honours from the rude attacks of detraction (x)."

(x) Knox's Eſſays, No. 114.

The poetic eulogiums have, however, exceeded, both in number and excellence, the compliments of critical writers. A few remarkably intereſting and beautiful, I ſhall ſelect, with the double view of adorning the work, and gratifying the reader.

A poet, whoſe ſuperior elegance and claſſical taſte do not appear to have met with all the applauſe they have deſerved, thus ſpeaks of Chatterton:

" Yet as with ſtreaming eye the ſorrowing muſe,
" Pale CHATTERTON's untimely urn bedews;
" Her accents ſhall arraign the partial care,
" That ſhielded not her ſon from cold deſpair (y)."

(y) Pye's Progreſs of Refinement, Part 2.

There is a beautiful monody written by Mrs. Cowley, inſerted in the laſt edition of Love and Madneſs.—It is as follows:

O CHATTERTON! for thee the penſive ſong I raiſe,
Thou object of my wonder, pity, envy, praiſe!
Bright Star of Genius!—torn from life and fame,
My tears, my verſe, ſhall conſecrate thy name!
Ye Muſes! who around his natal bed
Triumphant ſung, and all your influence ſhed;
APOLLO! thou who rapt his infant breaſt,
And in his dædal numbers ſhone confeſt,
Ah! why, in vain, ſuch mighty gifts beſtow?
—Why give freſh tortures to the Child of Woe?
Why thus, with barb'rous care, illume his mind,
Adding new ſenſe to all the ills behind?

Thou haggard Poverty! whoſe cheerleſs eye
Transforms young Rapture to the pond'rous ſigh,
In whoſe drear cave no Muſe e'er ſtruck the lyre,
Nor Bard e'er madden'd with poetic fire;

Why all thy ſpells for CHATTERTON combine!
His thought creative, why muſt thou confine?
Subdu'd by thee, his pen no more obeys,
No longer gives the ſong of ancient days;
Nor paints in glowing tints from diſtant ſkies,
Nor bids wild ſcen'ry ruſh upon our eyes——
Check'd in her flight, his rapid Genius cowers,
Drops her ſad plumes, and yields to thee her powers.

Behold him, Muſes! ſee your fav'rite ſon
The prey of want, ere manhood is begun!
The boſom ye have fill'd, with anguiſh torn——
The mind you cherish'd, drooping and forlorn!

And now Deſpair her ſable form extends,
Creeps to his couch, and o'er his pillow bends.
Ah, ſee! a deadly bowl the fiend conceal'd,
Which to his eye with caution is reveal'd——
Seize it, Apollo!—ſeize the liquid ſnare!
Daſh it to earth, or diſſipate in air!
Stay, helpleſs Youth! refrain—abhor the draught,
With pangs, with racks, with deep repentance fraught!
Oh, hold! the cup with woe ETERNAL flows,
More—more than Death the pois'nous juſtice beſtows!
In vain!—he drinks—and now the ſearching fires
Ruſh through his veins, and writhing he expires!
No ſorrowing friend, no ſiſter, parent, nigh,
To ſooth his pangs, or catch his parting ſigh;
Alone, unknown, the Muſe's darling dies,
And with the vulgar dead unnoted lies!
Bright Star of Genius!—torn from life and fame,
My tears, my verſe, ſhall conſecrate thy name!

Nor has the Muſe of Amwell been backward in commendation.

And BRISTOL! why thy ſcenes explore,
And why thoſe ſcenes ſo ſoon reſign,
And fail to ſeek the ſpot that bore
That wonderous tuneful Youth of thine,
The Bard, whoſe boaſted ancient ſtore
Roſe recent from his own exhauſtleſs mine [Z]!

Though Fortune all her gifts denied,
Though Learning made him not her choice,
The Muſe ſtill placed him at her ſide,
And bade him in her ſmile rejoice—
Deſcription ſtill his pen ſupplied,
Pathos his thought, and Melody his voice!

Conſcious and proud of merit high,
Fame's wreath he boldly claim'd to wear;
But Fame, regardleſs, paſs'd him by,
Unknown, or deem'd unworth her care:
The Sun of Hope forſook his ſky;
And all his land look'd dreary, bleak, and bare!

Then Poverty, grim ſpectre, roſe,
And horror o'er the proſpect threw—
His deep diſtreſs too nice to expoſe;
Too nice for common aid to ſue,
A dire alternative he choſe,
And raſhly from the painful ſcene withdrew.

[Z] Roſe recent from his own exhauſtleſs mine!]
This is at leaſt the Author's opinion, notwithſtanding all that has hitherto appeared on the other ſide of the queſtion. The laſt line alludes to one of the ingenious Mr. Maſon in his Elegy to a young Nobleman:

" See from the depths of his exhauſtleſs mine
" His glittering ſtores the tuneful ſpendthrift
" throws."

Ah!

Ah! why for Genius' headſtrong rage
Did Virtue's hand no curb prepare?
What boots, poor youth! that now thy page
Can boaſt the public praiſe to ſhare,
The learn'd in deep reſearch engage,
And lightly entertain the gentle fair?

Ye, who ſuperfluous wealth command,
O why your kind relief delay'd?
O why not ſnatch'd his deſperate hand?
His foot on Fate's dread brink not ſtay'd?
What thanks had you your native land
For a new SHAKESPEARE or new MILTON paid!

For me—Imagination's power
Leads oft inſenſibly my way,
To where, at midnight's ſilent hour,
The creſcent moon's ſlow-weſtering ray
Pours full on REDCLIFF's lofty tower,
And gilds with yellow light its walls of grey.

'Midſt Toil and Commerce ſlumbering round,
Lull'd by the riſing tide's hoarſe roar,
There Frome and Avon willow-crown'd,
I view ſad-wandering by the ſhore,
With ſtreaming tears, and notes of mournful ſound,
Too late their hapleſs Bard, untimely loſt, deplore.

The following lines are uncommonly animated and poetical:

If changing times ſuggeſt the pleaſing hope,
That Bards no more with adverſe fortune cope;
That in this alter'd clime, where Arts increaſe,
And make our poliſh'd Iſle a ſecond Greece;
That now, if Poeſy proclaims her Son,
And challenges the wreath by Fancy won;
Both Fame and Wealth adopt him as their heir,
And liberal Grandeur makes his life her care;
From ſuch vain thoughts thy erring mind defend,
And look on CHATTERTON's diſaſtrous end.
Oh, ill-ſtarr'd Youth, whom Nature form'd in vain,
With powers on Pindus' ſplendid height to reign!
O dread example of what pangs await
Young Genius ſtruggling with malignant fate!
What could the Muſe, who fir'd thy infant frame
With the rich promiſe of Poetic fame;
Who taught thy hand its magic art to hide,
And mock the inſolence of Critic pride;
What cou'd her unavailing cares oppoſe,
To ſave her darling from his deſperate foes;
From preſſing Want's calamitous controul,
And Pride, the fever of the ardent ſoul?
Ah, ſee, too conſcious of her failing power,
She quits her Nurſling in his deathful hour!
In a chill room, within whoſe wretched wall
No cheering voice replies to Miſery's call;
Near a vile bed, too crazy to ſuſtain
Misfortune's waſted limbs, convuls'd with pain,
On the bare floor, with heaven-directed eyes,
The hapleſs Youth in ſpeechleſs horror lies!
The pois'nous phial, by diſtraction drain'd,
Rolls from his hand, in wild contortion ſtrain'd:
Pale with life-waſting pangs, it's dire effect,
And ſtung to madneſs by the world's neglect,
He, in abhorrence of the dangerous Art,
Once the dear idol of his glowing heart,
Tears from his Harp the vain deteſted wires,
And in the frenzy of Deſpair expires (z)!

(z) Hayley's Eſſay on Epic Poetry, Ep. iv. l. 211 to 248.

Again,

Again, with all the honeſt reſentment of indignant Genius,

Search the dark ſcenes were drooping Genius lies,
And keep from ſorrieſt ſights a nation's eyes,
That, from expiring Want's reproaches free,
Our generous country ne'er may weep to ſee
A future CHATTERTON by poiſon dead,
An OTWAY fainting for a little bread (a).

(a) Ibid. 336 to 342.

To theſe elegant offerings to the genius of Chatterton, it is with peculiar pleaſure I add a ſonnet to Expreſſion, from the poliſhed and pathetic pen of Miſs Helen Maria Williams.

Expreſſion, child of ſoul! I fondly trace
Thy ſtrong enchantments, when the poet's lyre,
The painter's pencil catch thy ſacred fire,
And beauty wakes for thee her touching grace—
But from this frighted glance thy form avert
When horrors check thy tear, thy ſtruggling ſigh,
When frenzy rolls in thy impaſſion'd eye,
Or guilt ſits heavy on thy lab'ring heart—
Nor ever let my ſhudd'ring fancy bear
The waſting groan, or view the pallid look
Of him (b) the Muſes lov'd—when hope forſook
His ſpirit, vainly to the Muſes dear!
For charm'd with heav'nly ſong, this bleeding breaſt,
Mourns the bleſt power of verſe could give deſpair no reſt.—

(b) Chatterton.

Independently of the poems attributed to Rowley, Chatterton has left behind him a variety of pieces, publiſhed and unpubliſhed. The moſt conſiderable of the former are to be found in a volume of miſcellanies, publiſhed in 1778, to which is prefixed a ſketch for the late Alderman Beckford's ſtatue, a ſpecimen of Chatterton's abilities in the arts of drawing and deſign; and this publication was followed in 1786, by "a ſupplement to the miſcellanies of Thomas Chatterton." The compoſitions contained in both theſe volumes are ſcarcely to be inſpected with all the ſeverity of criticiſm. Conſiderable allowances ought to be made for the exerciſes of his infantine years, for the incorrect effuſions of momentary reſentment, for a few lines thrown together in a playful mood to pleaſe an illiterate female, or to amuſe a ſchool-fellow, and perhaps not leſs for the haſty and involuntary productions of indigence and neceſſity, conſtructed for a magazine, and calculated for the ſole purpoſe of procuring a ſubſiſtence. Of the poetical part of theſe miſcellanies, I have already intimated, that the ſerious are inferior to the ſatirical.

In the elegy to the memory of Mr. Thomas Phillips, of Fairford, we, however, meet with ſome deſcriptive ſtanzas, perhaps not unworthy the author of Rowley's poems:

"Pale rugged Winter bending o'er his head,
"His grizzled hair bedropt with icy dew;
"His eyes, a duſky light, congealed and dead;
"His robe, a tinge of bright ethereal blue.
"His train a motley'd, ſanguine ſable cloud,
"He limps along the ruſſet dreary moor;
"Whilſt riſing whirlwinds, blaſting, keen and loud,
"Roll the white ſurges to the ſounding ſhore."

"Fancy, whoſe various, figure-tinctured veſt
"Was ever changing to a different hue;
"Her head, with varied bays and flow'rets dreſt,
"Her eyes two ſpangles of the morning dew."

"Now as the mantle of the evening ſwells,
"Upon my mind I feel a thick'ning gloom!
"Ah! could I charm, by friendſhip's potent ſpells,
"The ſoul of Philip's from the deathy tomb!
"Then would we wander thro' the dark'ned vale,
"In converſe ſuch as heavenly ſpirits uſe,
"And borne upon the plumage of the gale,
"Hymn the creator and exhort the Muſe (c)."

(c) Chatterton's Miſcellanies.

In

In a letter to his friend Cary, dated London, July 1, 1770, Chatterton tells him, "in the laſt London Magazine, and in that which comes out to day, are the only two pieces of mine I have the vanity to call poetry." Theſe were the two African Eclogues, publiſhed in his Miſcellanies. I am ſorry I cannot unite with the author in the commendation of theſe pieces; but Chatterton, as well as Milton, ſeems to have been incapable of eſtimating rightly the reſpective merits of his own productions (d). They are unconnected and unequal, though it muſt be confeſſed, that they contain ſome excellent lines: the following occur almoſt at the beginning of the firſt eclogue, and are animated, expreſſive and harmonious:

(d) I know ſome reſpectable friends who eſteem this inſtance of bad taſte, as a ſtrong preſumptive argument againſt Chatterton being the author of Rowley's poems.

"High from the ground the youthful warriors ſprung;
"Loud on the concave ſhell the lances rung:
"In all the myſtic mazes of the dance,
"The youths of Banny's burning ſands advance;
"Whilſt the ſoft virgin, panting, looks behind,
"And rides upon the pinions of the wind (e)."

(e) Chatterton's Miſcellanies, p. 56.

Of the correctneſs of the following ſimile in the ſecond eclogue, I ſhall not determine; but the livelineſs of the deſcription evinces a moſt vigorous imagination.

"On Tiber's banks, cloſe rank'd, a warring train,
"Stretch'd to the diſtant edge of Galca's plain:
"So when arrived at Gaigra's higheſt ſteep,
"We view the wide expanſion of the deep;
"See in the gilding of her wat'ry robe,
"The quick declenſion of the circling globe;
"From the blue ſea a chain of mountains riſe,

The ſatire of Chatterton has more of the luxuriance, fluency, and negligence of Dryden, than of the terſeneſs and refinement of Pope. The following lines are in the ſtyle of the former:

"Search nature o'er, procure me, if you can,
"The fancied character, an honeſt man.
"A man of ſenſe not honeſt by conſtraint,
"(For fools are canvaſs, living but in paint)
"To Mammon, or to ſuperſtition ſlaves,
"All orders of mankind are fools or knaves:
"In the firſt attribute by none ſurpaſs'd,
"* endeavours to obtain the laſt (g)."

(g) Epiſtle to the Rev. Mr. Catcott, Append. to Chat. Miſ. p. 23.

The following is an evident imitation of Mr. Pope, even to the cadence of the verſe, but it is not equally ſucceſsful with the laſt ſpecimen:

"But why muſt Chatterton ſelected ſit,
"The butt of every Critic's little wit?
"Am I alone for ever in a crime,
"Nonſenſe in proſe, or blaſphemy in rhyme?
"All monoſyllables a line appears!—
"Is it not very often ſo in Shears?
"See gen'rous Eccas, length'ning out my praiſe,
"Inraptured with the muſic of my lays;
"In all the arts of panegyric grac'd,
"The cream of modern literary taſte (h)."

(h) The Defence, ibid. p. 37.

In a poem on Happineſs, inſerted in Love and Madneſs, are ſome ſtrokes of ſatire in a ſuperior ſtyle:

"Come to my pen, companion of the lay,
"And ſpeak of worth, where merit——
"Let lazy B——— undiſtinguiſh'd ſnore,
"Nor laſh his generoſity to ———,
"Praiſe him for ſermons of his curate bought,
"His eaſy flow of words, his depth of thought;

" His active ſpirit ever in diſplay,
" His great devotion when he drawls to pray,
" His ſainted ſoul diſtinguiſhably ſeen,
" With all the virtues of a modern Dean (i)."

(i) Love and Madneſs, p. 155.

" Pulvis, whoſe knowledge centres in degrees,
" Is never happy but when taking fees:
" Bleſt with a buſhy wig and ſolemn pace,
" Catcott admires him for a foſſile face."
—" Mould'ring in duſt the fair Lavinia lies,
" Death and our Doctor clos'd her ſparkling eyes.
" O all ye pow'rs, the guardians of the world!
" Where is the uſeleſs bolt of vengeance hurl'd?
" Say, ſhall this leaden ſword of plague prevail,
" And kill the mighty where the mighty fail?
" Let the red bolus tremble o'er his head,
" And with his guardian julep ſtrike him dead (k)!"

(k) Ibid. p. 156.

In the volume of his miſcellanies are two political pieces, the Conſuliad, written at Briſtol, and in the higheſt ſtrain of party ſcurrility [AA]; and the Prophecy, written apparently a ſhort time after, which is in the beſt ſtyle of Swift's minor pieces, and appears to be the genuine effuſion of that enthuſiaſtic love of liberty, which in tumultuous times generally takes poſſeſſion of young and ſanguine diſpoſitions [BB].

THE PROPHECY.

THIS truth of old was ſorrow's friend,
" Times at the worſt will ſurely mend."
The difficulty's then to know,
How long oppreſſion's clock can go;
When Britain's ſons may ceaſe to ſigh,
And hope that their redemption's nigh.

When Vice exalted takes the lead,
And Vengeance hangs but by a thread;
Gay peereſſes turn'd out o'doors;
Whoremaſters, peers, and ſons of whores;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When vile Corruption's brazen face,
At council-board ſhall take her place;
And lord's-commiſſioners reſort,
To welcome her at Britain's court;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

See Penſion's harbour large and clear,
Defended by St. Stephen's pier!
The entrance ſafe, by Current led,
Tiding round G—'s jetty head;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When Civil-Power ſhall ſnore at eaſe,
While ſoldiers fire—to keep the peace;
When murders ſanctuary find,
And petticoats can Juſtice blind;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

Commerce o'er Bondage will prevail,
Free as the wind, that fills her ſail.
When ſhe complains of vile reſtraint,
And Power is deaf to her complaint;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When raw projectors ſhall begin Oppreſſion's hedge, to keep her in;
She in diſdain will take her flight,
And bid the Gotham fools good night;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When tax is laid, to ſave debate,
By prudent miniſters of ſtate;
And, what the people did not give,
Is levied by prerogative;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When Popiſh biſhops dare to claim
Authority, in George's name;
By Treaſon's hand ſet up, in ſpite
Of George's title, William's right;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When Popiſh prieſt a penſion draws
From ſtarv'd exchequer, for the cauſe Commiſſion'd, proſelytes to make
In Britiſh realms, for Britain's ſake:
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When ſnug in power, ſly recuſants
Make laws for Britiſh Proteſtants;
And d——g William's Revolution,
As Juſtices claim execution;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When ſoldiers, paid for our defence,
In wanton pride ſlay innocence;
Blood from the ground for vengeance reeks,
Till Heaven the inquiſition makes;

Look

Of the proſe compoſitions of Chatterton, his imitations of Oſſian are certainly the worſt: he has not indeed improved upon an indifferent model. They are full of wild imagery and inconſiſtent metaphor, with little either of plot or of character to recommend them.

His lighter Eſſays, ſuch as the adventures of a ſtar, the memoirs of a ſad dog, the hunter of oddities, &c. diſplay conſiderable knowledge of what is called the town, and demonſtrate the keenneſs of his obſervation, and his quickneſs in acquiring any branch of knowledge, or in adapting himſelf to any ſituation. We are to remember, however, that he had been long converſant in this ſpecies of compoſition, and that a conſiderable fund of reading in Magazines, Reviews, &c. which Mr. Warton obſerves "form the ſchool of the people," had prepared him well to exerciſe the profeſſion of a periodical writer. Antiquities, however, conſtituted his favorite ſtudy, and in them his genius always appears to the greateſt advantage. Even the moſt humorous of his pieces (Tony Selwood's letter (l) derives its principal excellence from his knowledge of ancient cuſtoms.

In the volume of Miſcellanies attributed to him, there are ſome pieces to which his title is not well aſcertained. Some with the ſignature of Aſaphides, are claimed by one Lock-ſtone, a Linen-Draper, and a particular acquaintance of Chatterton; and the ſtory of Maria Friendleſs, which Chatterton himſelf ſent to the Town and Country Magazine, probably for the ſake of obtaining an immediate and neceſſary ſupply of money, is almoſt a literal tranſcript of the letter of Miſella in the Rambler.

If the reputation of Chatterton, however, reſted ſolely on thoſe works, which he acknowledged as his own, it would neither be ſo extenſive as it is, nor probably ſo permanent as it is likely to continue. Rowley's poems have deſervedly immortalized the name of Chatterton, and the controverſy which their publication excited, is the moſt curious and extraordinary controverſy, which, ſince the days of Bentley, has divided the literary world.

I have already noticed the manner in which theſe poems are ſaid to have been diſcovered. The account which Chatterton himſelf gave of the ſuppoſed author is nearly as follows:

THOMAS ROWLEY was born at Norton Mal-ſeward in Somerſetſhire, and educated at the convent of St. Kenna, at Keyneſham (m). He was of the clerical profeſſion, was confeſſor to the two Canynge's, Robert and William, about the latter end of the reign of Henry the VIth, or about the beginning of that of Edward IV.; and was at leaſt connected with our Lady's church in Briſtol (n); though he is elſewhere ſtyled the "pariſh prieſt of St. John's, in the city of Briſtol (o)." After the death of Mr. Robert Canynge, (who at his brother's deſire, bequeathed Rowley 100 marks) he was employed by that brother, Mr. William, to travel through a conſiderable part of England to collect drawings. Mr. Canynge was ſo well ſatisfied with his ſucceſs, that he rewarded him with a purſe of two hundred pounds, and promiſed him that he ſhould never be in want. He continued afterwards the confidential friend of Canynge. He wrote a variety of poems, many of them addreſſed to that extraordinary character. He firſt lived in a houſe on the hill, and afterwards in one by the Tower (p): he ſurvived his patron, and died at Weſtbury, in Glouceſterſhire (q). Such is Chatterton's account: but it is only fair to mention, that the exiſtence of any ſuch perſon as Rowley, is totally denied by the diſputants on one ſide of the controverſy.

There can, however, be no doubt concerning the exiſtence of W. Canynge, the patron of Rowley, ſince it is atteſted by ſuch a number of contemporary hiſtorians, and his remains lie interred in the church of which he was the founder. He is called by Chatterton, Sir William Canynge. He was the younger ſon of a citizen of Briſtol, and in his youth afforded early prognoſtics of wiſdom and ability. He was of a handſome perſon, and

Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,

When at Bute's feet poor Freedom lies,
Mark'd by the prieſt for ſacrifice,
And doom'd a victim, for the ſins

For your redemption draweth nigh.

When Stewards paſs a boot account,
And credit for the groſs amount;
Then to replace exhauſted ſtore,
Mortgage the land to borrow more;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When ſcrutineers, for private ends,

Or judge, as you ſtand there alive,
That five is more than forty-five;
Look up, ye Britons! ceaſe to ſigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When George ſhall condeſcend to hear
The modeſt ſuit, the humble prayer;
A prince, to purpled pride unknown!
No favourites diſgrace the throne!
Look up, ye Britons! ſigh no more,
For your redemption's at the door.

When time ſhall bring your wiſh about,
Or, ſeven-years leaſe, you ſold, is out;
No future contract to fulfil;
Your tenants holding at your will;
Raiſe up your heads! your right demand!
For your redemption's in your hand.

Then is your time to ſtrike the blow,
And let the ſlaves of Mammon know,
Britain's true ſons A BRIBE can ſcorn,
And die as free as they were born.
VIRTUE again ſhall take her ſeat,
And your redemption ſtand compleat.

married

married for love, without a fortune. Soon after his marriage, his father and his eldeſt brother (who both loved money as much as he deſpiſed it) died, and left him large eſtates in land and money, and his brother John dependent upon him, whom he placed in ſuch an advantageous line of buſineſs, that he afterwards became Lord-Mayor of London.

This dawn of proſperity was, however, ſoon clouded by the death of his wife; to whoſe memory he afforded the moſt affectionate teſtimony, in rejecting the moſt ſplendid propoſals for a ſecond marriage. Of his native city he was Mayor five times; and in the year 1461, when Sir Baldwin Fulford was executed for treaſon, Canynge being then Mayor, pleaded for the criminal in vain. When he was knighted does not appear; but in the year 1467, a ſecond marriage being propoſed by the King, between him and one of the Widdeville, (the Queen's) family, Sir William went into holy orders purpoſely to avoid it; and was ordained Acolythe by his friend Carpenter, Biſhop of Worceſter, the 19th of September. He was afterwards Dean of the Collegiate church of Weſtbury in Wilts. With his uſual munificence he rebuilt that college, and died in the year 1474, with the univerſal character of learning and virtue. Among the proofs of his munificence there ſtill exiſt an alms-houſe or hoſpital, with a chapel, and the beautiful church of St. Mary Redcliffe, in Briſtol (r). At a great expenſe he had collected a cabinet of curioſities (s). His collection of manuſcripts, among which were copies of his own and Rowley's poems, were depoſited in a room in Redcliffe church: of the actual or pretended diſcovery of which I have already treated. Such is Chatterton's hiſtory of Canynge, in which, though there are ſome facts, which are amply confirmed, there are alſo ſeveral which are diſputed by thoſe who deny the authenticity of Rowley's poems.

Theſe poems, we have already ſeen, were produced by Chatterton at different times, who aſſerted that he had copied them from the fragments of thoſe ancient parchments, which his father had procured from the Redcliffe cheſt. He could never be prevailed upon to produce any originals, except a few fragments, the largeſt not more than eight inches long, and four and a half wide. The writing on theſe fragments was at leaſt a tolerable imitation of ancient manuſcript, and the parchment or vellum had every mark of age. The only poetical originals which he produced were, the challenge to Lydgate, the ſong to Ella, and Lydgate's anſwer, all contained in one parchment; the account of W. Canynge's feaſt; the epitaph on Robert Canynge, and part of the ſtory of W. Canynge. Beſides theſe there are ſome proſe compoſitions, and a few drawings, ſtill in the hands of Mr. Barrett [CC].

The poems attributed to Rowley were firſt collected in an octavo volume, and publiſhed by Mr. Tyrwhitt, the learned editor of Chaucer. A very ſplendid edition was afterwards publiſhed in quarto, by the late Dr. Milles, Dean of Exeter, and Preſident of the Society of Antiquaries, with a preliminary diſſertation, and notes tending to prove that they were really written by Rowley and others in the 15th century.

The poetical merit of theſe pieces is conſiderable. The ſubjects are intereſting, and infinite imagination is diſplayed in the conſtruction of the plots or fables, in the arrangement of the incidents, and the delineation of the characters. The beauties of poetry are ſcattered through them with no ſparing hand. The Lyric productions in particular, ſuch as the choruſſes in the Tragedies, abound with luxuriant deſcription, moſt vivid imagery, and ſtriking metaphors. Through the veil of ancient language a happy adaptation of

The Song to Ella, with the challenge to Lydgate and the Anſwer. This poem was ſent by Mr. Barrett to a friend, and is unfortunately loſt.

Canynge's Feaſt, a Poem.

The firſt thirty-ſix lines of the Storie of William Canyne.

The following are Hiſtorical Proſe Compoſitions.

1. The Yellow Roll, containing an account of the origin of coinage in England, and of the curioſities in Canynge's cabinet. This alſo was lent with the ſong to Ella, by Mr. Barrett to a friend, and is loſt.
2. The purple Roll, thirteen inches by ten, containing an account of particular Coins, and the ſecond and third Sections of Turgotus's Hiſtory of Briſtol. N. B. The firſt Section above quoted is alſo extant in Chatterton's own hand, but the original does not appear.
3. Vita Burtoni, a parchment roll, about eight inches long, and four broad, very cloſely written; containing an account of Sir Simon de Burton, and his rebuilding Redcliff church.
4. Knights Templars Church; a Hiſtory of its foundation, &c.
5. St. Mary's Church of the Port; a Hiſtory of it from its foundation, ending with the verſes on Robert Canynge.
6. Roll of Bartholomew's Priory, with a Liſt of the Priors.
7. An account of the Chapel and Houſe of Calendaries; a drawing of the chapel, and underneath an explanation of it.
8. Ella's Chappel. No drawing, except to the Kiſt of Ella, but there is an account of its foundation.
9. St. Mary Magdalen's Chapel. A drawing only.
10. Grey Friars Church. A drawing only.
11. Drawing of three monumental Inſcriptions.
12. Ancient Monument and Rudhall: mere delineations.
13. Leſſer and Greater St. John's: only a rude delineation.
14. Several Drawings of the Caſtle of Briſtol.
15. Strong Hold of the Caſtle: a drawing and account of its foundation, by Robert Earl of Glouceſter, and Site thereof.
16. Old Wall of Briſtol; mere drawings.
17. Carne of Robert Curthoſes Mynde in Caſtle ſteed: a drawing or figure, with the words Carne, &c. underneath (14).

words

words is ſtill apparent, and a ſtyle both energetic and expreſſive. Contrary to almoſt all the poetical productions of the times, when they are ſuppoſed to have been compoſed, they are in general conſpicuous for the harmony and elegance of the verſe. Indeed, ſome paſſages are inferior in none of the eſſentials of poetry, to the moſt finiſhed productions of modern times.

On the other hand, it muſt not be diſſembled that ſome (and many will think no inconſiderable) part of the charm of theſe poems may probably reſult from the Gothic ſublimity of the ſtyle. Whatever is vulgar in language is loſt by time, and a ſmall degree of obſcurity in an ancient author gives a latitude to the fancy of the reader, who generally imagines the ſtyle to be more forcible and expreſſive than perhaps it intrinſically is. We gaze with wonder on an antique fabrick; and when novelty of thought is not to be obtained, the novelty of language to which we are unaccuſtomed, is frequently accepted as a ſubſtitute. Moſt poets therefore, at leaſt ſuch as have aſpired to the ſublime, have thrown their dialect at leaſt a century behind the common proſe, and colloquial phraſeology of their time: nor can we entertain a doubt, but that even Shakeſpeare and Milton have derived advantages from the antique ſtructure of ſome of their moſt admired paſſages. The facility of compoſition is alſo greatly increaſed where full latitude is permitted in the uſe of an obſolete dialect; ſince an author is indulged in the occaſional uſe of both the old and the modern phraſeology; and if the one does not ſupply him with the word for which he has immediate occaſion, the other in all probability will not diſappoint him.

That the ſubjects of Rowley's poems are in general intereſting and well choſen, cannot, I think, be doubted by the judicious reader; but ſtill it muſt be confeſſed, that the detail is occaſionally heavy, flat, and inſipid. The imagery and metaphors are frequently very common-place, and it is poſſible to labour through ſeveral ſtanzas without finding any ſtriking beauty, when the attention of the reader is kept alive by the ſubject alone. Many defects of ſtyle, and many paſſages of rant and bombaſt are concealed or excuſed by the appearance of antiquity; and where the harmony of the verſe (which indeed is not often the caſe) is, perhaps, radically deficient, we are inclined to attribute it to a different mode of accenting, or to our ignorance of the ancient pronunciation.

The piece of moſt conſpicuous merit in the collection, is Ella, a Tragical Interlude, which is a complete and well-written tragedy. The plot is both intereſting and full of variety, though the dialogue is in ſome places tedious. The character of Celmonde reminds us of Glenalvon in Douglas, but it is better drawn: His ſoliloquy is beautiful and characteriſtic [DD]. The firſt chorus, or "Mynſtrelles Songe" in this piece, is a perfect paſtoral. It abounds in natural and tender ſentiments, and appoſite imagery, and the fertility of the author's genius is diſplayed in this little ballad; ſince ſhort as it is, it contains a complete plot or fable [EE].

There

There are extant two parts, or rather two different copies of the Battle of Haſtings. Theſe appear to have been higher in the eſtimation of Chatterton, as well as of Dr. Milles, than moſt of the other productions of Rowley. When Chatterton brought the firſt part to Mr. Barrett, being greatly preſſed to produce the poem in the original hand-writing, he at laſt ſaid, that he had written this poem himſelf for a friend; but that he had another, the copy of an original by Rowley: and being then deſired to produce that poem, he brought, after ſome time, to Mr. Barrett, the poem which is marked in Mr. Tyrwhit's and Dr. Milles's editions, as No. 2 *.

(*) Introd. Account prefixed to Rowley's poems, p. 21.

The firſt of theſe poems I cannot help claſſing among the moſt inferior of Rowley's. The mere detail of violence and carnage, with nothing to intereſt curioſity, or engage the more tender paſſions, can be pleaſing to few readers. There is not a ſingle epiſode to enliven the tedious narrative, and but few of the beauties of poetry to relieve the mind from the diſguſting ſubject.

The ſecond part is far ſuperior. There is more of poetical deſcription in it, more of nature, more of character. The imagery is more animated, the incidents more varied. The character of Tancarville is well drawn, and the ſpirit of candour and humanity which pervades it, is perhaps unparalleled in any writer before the age of Shakeſpeare. The whole epiſode of Gyrtha is well conducted, and the altercation between him and his brother Harold, is intereſting. But the deſcription of morning [FF], and that of Saliſbury plain [GG], would be alone ſufficient to reſcue the whole poem from oblivion, and to entitle it to a place upon a claſſic ſhelf. The utmoſt efforts of the author, however, cannot always impart intereſt or variety to the dull catalogue of names, which have ceaſed to be remembered, and the unvaried recital of wounds and deaths. But Homer himſelf nods when engaged upon a topic ſo unfavourable to genius.

The Briſtowe Tragedy, or the Deathe of Syr Charles Bawdin, has little but its pathetic ſimplicity to recommend it. There is nothing ingenious in the plot, or ſtriking in the execution; and it only ranks upon a par with a number of tragic ballads, both ancient and modern, in the ſame ſtyle.

The eclogues are to be accounted ſome of the moſt perfect ſpecimens among the poems of Rowley. Indeed, I am not acquainted with any paſtorals ſuperior to them, either ancient or modern. The firſt of them bears a remote reſemblance to the firſt eclogue of Virgil; and contains a beautiful and pathetic picture of the ſtate of England, during the civil wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter. The thoughts and images are all truly paſtoral; and it is impoſſible to read it, without experiencing thoſe lively, yet melancholy feelings, which a true delineation of nature alone can inſpire. I cannot help feeling an irreſiſtable inclination to preſent the reader with two ſtanzas, which have ever appeared to me particularly beautiful.

The ſecond eclogue is an eulogium on the actions of Richard I. in the Holy-land, which will be read with additional pleaſure by thoſe who have ſeen the ſhort but ſpirited ſketch of theſe wars in Mr. Gibbon's laſt volumes. The poem is ſuppoſed to be ſung by a young ſhepherd, whoſe father is abſent on the Holy war: and the Epode, or burthen, is happily imagined:

"Sprytes of the bleſt, and every ſeyncte ydedde,
"Pour out your pleaſaunce on my fadre's hedde."

Before he has concluded his ſong, he is cheered by the ſight of the veſſel in which his father returns victorious.

The third paſtoral is chiefly to be admired for its excellent morality. It is, however, enlivened by a variety of appropriate imagery, and many of the ornaments of true poetry.

The laſt of theſe paſtorals, called Elinoure and Juga, is one of the fineſt pathetic tales I have ever read. The complaint of two young females lamenting their lovers ſlain in the wars of York and Lancaſter, was one of the happieſt ſubjects that could be choſen for a tragic paſtoral. Two ſtanzas of this poem, will, I flatter myſelf, amply juſtify this opinion. Part of the former has been ſuppoſed, by the Anti-Rowleians, to be an imitation of a ſtanza in Mr. Gray's elegy,

"The breezy call of incenſe breathing morn, &c."

The ballad of Charity is an imitation of the moſt beautiful and affecting of our Saviour's parables, the good Samaritan.—The poetical deſcriptions are truly pictureſque. We feel the horror of the dark, cold night; we ſee "the big drops fall," and the "full flocks driving o'er the plain." "The welkin opens, and the yellow light'ning flies." "The thunder's rattling ſound moves ſlowly on, and ſwelling, burſts into a violent craſh; ſhakes the high ſpire," &c. If Chatterton were really the author of this poem, he probably alluded to his own deſerted ſituation, ſince, it is ſaid, he gave it to the publiſher of the Town and Country Magazine, only a month before his death:

"Haſte to thie church-glebe houſe [1] aſhrewed [2] manne!

The poems of Rowley had not been long made public before their authenticity underwent a ſevere ſcrutiny; and a number of Gentlemen, converſant in antiquities, declared, that they could not be the productions of the fifteenth century, and openly pronounced them the forgeries of Chatterton. Their authenticity was defended by other perſons of no inconſiderable note in the literary world. The controverſy ſoon became voluminous; and the reader will not be inclined to conſider it as unimportant, when on one ſide the names of Walpole, Tyrwhitt, Warton [II], Croft, and Malone, are mentioned; and on the other, thoſe of Milles and Bryant; and I think I may venture to add, that of Mr. Matthias, though his candour and modeſty almoſt exempt him from being conſidered as a partiſan.

I ſhall endeavour to exhibit a ſhort ſketch of the arguments on both ſides of the queſtion, and ſhall leave my readers to form their own concluſions.

The evidence on this ſubject naturally divides itſelf into two branches, external and internal. Of the former, there is little ſatisfactory to be obtained; and it muſt be confeſſed, that the bulk of the external evidence is rather againſt that party which denies the authenticity of the poems. There are, however, a few facts on that ſide of the queſtion which are of too much conſequence to be diſregarded.

Arguments against the Authenticity of Rowley's Poems.

External Evidence.

I. The firſt ſerious objection which occurs againſt the authenticity of the poems, is, that Chatterton never could be prevailed upon to produce more than four of the originals, and theſe extremely ſhort, the whole not containing more than one hundred and twenty four verſes (t). Had ſuch a treaſure of ancient poetry fallen into the hands of a young and ingenuous perſon, would he, it is ſaid, have cautiouſly produced them to the world one by one? Would he not rather have been proud of his good fortune? Would not the communicativeneſs of youth have induced him to blaze the diſcovery abroad, and to call every lover of poetry and antiquity, to a participation of the pleaſure? Would not the hope and offers of reward at leaſt have prevented his deſtroying what, if preſerved, would certainly be productive of profit, but the deſtruction of which could anſwer no purpoſe whatever (u)?

(t) Tyrwhitt's Vindication, p. 133.

(u) An examination, &c. p. 9. Tyrwhitt's Vindication, p. 155. See alſo ſome excellent remarks to the ſame purpoſe, by the late Mr. Badcock, Monthly Review for May, 1782.

II. The deficiency of proof in favour of Rowley, is ſtrongly aided by the very probable proofs in favour of Chatterton. His abilities were in every reſpect calculated for ſuch a deception. He had been in the habit of writing verſes from his earlieſt youth, and produced ſome excellent poetry. He was known to have been converſant with our old Engliſh Poets and Hiſtorians, particularly Chaucer. His fondneſs for heraldry, intro-

[II] The names of —— Tyrwhitt, Warton.] I have been well informed that both Mr. Warton and Tyrwhitt were formerly of ſentiments directly oppoſite to thoſe which they profeſs in their publications: if the poems therefore be forgeries of Chatterton, theſe Gentlemen were at leaſt among the firſt on whom he impoſed.

duced many books of antiquities to his notice; and even his profeſſion diſpoſed him to theſe ſtudies, and enabled him with facility to imitate ancient writings. In the Chriſtmas games, which are acknowledged to be his own, there is much of that peculiar learning in Britiſh antiquities, which was neceſſary to lay the foundation of Rowley's poems; and in his Eſſay on Sculpture, there is much of the ſame general information with which thoſe compoſitions abound [KK]. The tranſport and delight, which Chatterton always diſcovered on reading the poems to Mr. Smith, his ſiſter, and his different friends, could not, it is ſaid, have reſulted from the mere pleaſure of a diſcovery. It was the ſecret, but ardent feeling of his own abilities, and the conſciouſneſs that the praiſes which were beſtowed upon them were all his own, which filled him with exultation, and produced thoſe ſtrong emotions which even his habitual reſerve on this ſubject was unable to conceal (w).

(w) Monthly Review for March 1782.

III. The declaration of Chatterton to Mr. Barrett, concerning the firſt part of the Battle of Haſtings, which he confeſſed he had written himſelf, is a preſumption againſt the reſt. He was then taken by ſurprize, but at other times preſerved a degree of conſiſtency in his falſehood.

IV. Mr. Ruddall, an intimate acquaintance of Chatterton, declared to Mr. Croft, that he ſaw him (Chatterton) diſguiſe ſeveral pieces of parchment with the appearances of age, and that Chatterton told him, that the parchment which Mr. Ruddall had aſſiſted him in blacking and diſguiſing, was the very parchment he had ſent to the printer's containing "the account of the Fryers paſſing the old bridge [LL].

V. The

[KK] The ſame general information with which thoſe compoſitions abound.] In the ſupplement to the works of Chatterton, (printed for Becket, 1784,) there is inſerted a piece which has been already referred to, called Chatterton's will. This appears to have been written a few days before he left Briſtol to go to London; when in conſequence, as it ſhould ſeem, of his being refuſed a ſmall ſum of money by a Gentleman, whom he had occaſionally complimented in his poems, he had taken a reſolution of deſtroying himſelf the next day. What prevented him from carrying this deſign at that time into execution does not appear; but the whole writing on this occaſion is worth attention, as it throws much light on his real character, his acquaintance with old Engliſh writers, and his capability of underſtanding and imitating old French and Latin inſcriptions, not indeed gramatically, but ſufficiently to anſwer the purpoſes to which he often applied this knowledge. From this writing it alſo appears that he would not allow King David to have been a holy man, from the ſtrains of piety and devotion in his pſalms, becauſe a great genius can effect any thing; that is, aſſume any character and mode of writing he pleaſes. This is an anſwer from Chatterton himſelf, to one argument, and a very powerful one, in ſupport of the authenticity of Rowley's poems. In that part of the will addreſſed to Mr. George Catcott, Chatterton mentions Rowley's poems, but in ſo guarded a manner, that it is not eaſy to draw any certain information for or againſt their authenticity; though the parties on both ſides have attempted it. The addreſs to Mr. Barrett does no leſs credit to his own feelings, than to that Gentleman's treatment of him; and the apology that follows to the two Mr. Catcotts, for ſome effuſions of his ſatire upon them, is the beſt recompence he then had in his power to make to thoſe Gentlemen, from whom he had experienced much civility and kindneſs. O.

[LL] The very parchment he had ſent to the Printer's, containing "the account of the Fryers paſſing the old bridge."

"To George Steevens, Eſq; Hampſtead Heath.

"Dear Sir,

"It gives me pleaſure that Love and Madness, which I put together in a few idle hours, as much for the ſake of doing juſtice to poor Chatterton as of blunting the edge of Hackman's ſhocking example, has ſo well anſwered the former purpoſe,

"——— Where'er (his bones at reſte)
"His ſpryte to haunte delyghteth beſte,"

Chatterton muſt be now not a little gratified when he looks down upon the ſquabbles he has raiſed on earth. Every ſyllable which I have made Hackman relate of him in Love and Madness is, I firmly believe, religiouſly true. Walmſly was my tenant for the houſe in Shoreditch, where Chatterton lodged with him, at the time he gave me the information contained in my book. Chatterton's letters which I printed, and which are hardly leſs ſingular perhaps than Rowley's poems, are confeſſedly original.

"As I cannot ſpare time from my profeſſion to enter any farther into this diſpute, and as you inform me that Mr. Warton is going to publiſh ſomething, I write this letter, according to your deſire, in anſwer to your's of yeſterday, reſpecting what long ſince I ſaid to you of Mr. Ruddall; and it is perfectly at Mr. Warton's ſervice. But I muſt deſire he will print it exactly as I ſend it you. When I have ſpoken for myſelf, he may draw his own arguments from my communication.

"The left hand column is an extract from Dean Milles's quarto edition of Rowley's, i. e. of Chatterton's poems, p. 436, 7. The right hand column is my account of the ſame buſineſs. In ſome material circumſtances he certainly errs. It were eaſy to ſhew, the Dean has condemned Chatterton, and robbed him of Rowley's poems upon ſlighter evidence of leſs material miſtakes.

"That the Dean ſhould have received all his information of this buſineſs from Mr. Ruddall, is certainly impoſſible, becauſe ſome part of his account of it is certainly untrue. The paſſages in the Dean's account, on which I comment, are marked, that they may be printed in Italics.

"A ſingular circumſtance relating to the hiſtory of this ceremony ("of paſſing the old bridge") has been communicated to the Publick within theſe two laſt years; and candour requires that it ſhould not paſs unnoticed here, eſpecially as the character of the relator leaves no room for ſuſpicion. The objectors to the authenticity of theſe poems may poſſibly triumph in the diſcovery of a fact, which contains, in their opinion,

The circumſtance is ſingular, and I have always thought ſo; but it has never yet, I believe, been communicated to the Publick; though I certainly meant it ſhould ſome time or other.

It

V. The Rev. Mr. Catcott, brother to the Mr. Catcott before mentioned, affirmed, that having had a converſation one evening with Chatterton, he traced the very ſubſtance of this opinion, a deciſive proof that Chatterton was the author of this paper, and (as they would infer) of all the poetry which he produced under Rowley's name; but, when the circumſtances are attentively examined, the reader will probably find, that even this fact tends rather to eſtabliſh, than to invalidate, the authenticity of the poems.

Mr. John Ruddall, a native and inhabitant of Briſtol, and formerly apprentice to Mr. Francis Greſley, an Apothecary in that city, was well acquainted with Chatterton, whilſt he was apprentice to Mr. Lambert. During that time, Chatterton frequently called upon him at his maſter's houſe, and, ſoon after he had printed this acconnt of the Bridge in the Briſtol paper, told Mr. Ruddall, that he was the author of it; but, it occurring to him afterwards, that he might be called upon to produce the original, he brought to him one day a piece of Parchment, about the ſize of a half Sheet of Fool's Cap paper. Mr. Ruddall does not think that any thing was written on it when produced by Chatterton, but he ſaw him write ſeveral Words, if not lines, in a Character which Mr. Ruddall did not underſtand, which he ſays was totally unlike Engliſh, and, as he apprehended, was meant by Chatterton, to imitate or repreſent the original from which this Account was printed. He cannot determine preciſely how much Chatterton wrote in this manner, but ſays, that the time he ſpent in that Viſit did not exceed three quarters of an hour. The Size of the Parchment, however, (even ſuppoſing it to have been filled with writing) will in ſome meaſure aſcertain the quantity which it contained.

He ſays alſo, that when Chatterton had written on the Parchment, he held it over the Candle, to give it the appearance of antiquity, which changed the Colour of the Ink, and made the Parchment appear black and a little contracted: he never ſaw him make any ſimilar attempt, nor was the Parchment produced afterwards by Chatterton to him, or (as far as he knows) to any other perſon. From a perfect knowledge of Chatterton's abilities, he thinks him to have been incapable of writing the Battle of Haſtings, or any of thoſe Poems produced by him under the name of Rowley, nor does he remember that Chatterton ever mentioned Rowley's Poems to him, either as original or the contrary; but ſometimes (though very rarely) intimated that he was poſſeſſed of ſome valuable literary productions. Mr. Ruddall had promiſed Chatterton not to reveal this Secret, and he ſcrupulouſly kept his word till the year 1779; but, ON THE PROSPECT OF PROCURING A GRATUITY OF TEN POUNDS, FOR CHATTERTON'S MOTHER, FROM A GENTLEMAN WHO CAME TO BRISTOL IN ORDER TO COLLECT INFORMATION CONCERNING HER SON'S HISTORY, he thought ſo material a benefit to the Family would fully juſtify him for divulging a ſecret by which no perſon now living could be a ſufferer."

It is not clear to me, that the advocates for Chatterton have occaſion to be apprehenſive, if the circumſtances ſhould be attentively examined even according to the Dean's own ſhewing. But mine is ſomewhat different.

My viſit to Briſtol of a few days, in order to collect information concerning Chatterton, was on the 23d of July, 1778. At that time I gave ſomething to the Mother and Siſter for their voluntary communications to me. After I publiſhed LOVE AND MADNESS, I laid a larger plan for their benefit, which I hope ſtill to ſee carried into execution; and I deſtined ſomething more to the family of him whoſe genius I ſo much reſpected, though I well knew his family deemed me their enemy for endeavouring to prove him guilty of Forgery. Prevented from going to Bath, and conſequently from giving what I had ſet apart for this purpoſe, with my own Hands, I gladly ſeized the liberty allowed me by a friend of Mr. Ruddall to beg this favour of him. On the 22d of March, 1781, I wrote to Mr. Ruddall, to whom I was then a perfect ſtranger, making uſe of his Friend's name, and encloſing a Draught to him or his order for ten pounds, requeſting he would give the Money to Chatterton's Mother and Siſter. On the 30th of the ſame Month, Mr. Ruddall called upon me in Lincoln's Inn; appeared, as I imagined, to lean to the ſide of this queſtion which I have ever thought to be the right; and told me, of his own accord, what certainly agrees no more with the Dean's account, than what I have already related agrees with the Dean's ſaying that Mr. Ruddall told this, in 1779, on the proſpect of procuring a gratuity of ten Pounds for Chatterton's Mother, from a Gentleman who came to Briſtol in order to collect information concerning her Son's Hiſtory.

If my Memory not only fails me now, but failed me the ſame day, and has failed me ever ſince, Mr. Ruddall will correct me. To him I appeal, and by him I muſt ſubmit to be corrected. But, on the 30th of March, 1781, he told me, AS I THINK, that he aſſiſted Chatterton in diſguiſing SEVERAL pieces of Parchment with the appearances of Age, juſt before "the Account of paſſing the Bridge" appeared in Farley's Journal; that, after they had made ſeveral experiments, Chatterton ſaid, "this will do, now I will "black THE Parchment;" that, whether he told him at the time what THE Parchment was, he could not remember; that he believed he did not ſee Chatterton black THE Parchment, but that Chatterton told him, after "the Account of paſſing the Bridge" had appeared in the News-paper, that THE Parchment which he had blacked and diſguiſed, after their experiments, was what he had ſent to the Printer containing the ACCOUNT."

"As this appeared to me the moſt deciſive evidence, I aſked Mr. Ruddall's leave to make uſe of his name about it, which he granted me; and I made a Memorandum of it, the ſame day, at the diſtance of a few hours. But it is ſtill poſſible my Memory might deceive me. In matters more ſerious than the authenticity of Poems, which are certainly exquiſite, whoever wrote them, it is not my way, I hope, to be more poſitive than I ought.

"Mr. Ruddall will excuſe me if I ſay, that I cannot poſſibly allow him, or any one, to determine the authenticity of the Poems, by telling the Dean, or the world, that, "from a perfect knowledge of Chatterton's this converſation, in a piece which that indefatigable genius produced ſometime after as Rowley's.

VI. Chatterton at firſt exhibited the Songe to Elle in his own hand-writing; and afterwards in the parchment, which he gave to Mr. Barrett as the original, there were found ſeveral variations, which it is ſuppoſed he had admitted through forgetfulneſs, or perhaps, as actual corrections, conſidering that the parchment was the copy which probably would be reſorted to as a ſtandard (x).

(x) Curſory Obſervations on Rowley's Poems, p. 44.

VII. The hand-writing of the fragment containing the ſtorie of W. Canynge, is quite different from the handwriting of that which contains "the accounte of W. Canynge's feaſt;" and neither of them is written in the uſual record hand of the age to which they are attributed. Indeed, in the "accounte of W. Canynge's Feaſte," the Arabian numerals, (63) are ſaid to be perfectly modern, totally different from the figures uſed in the fifteenth century, and exactly ſuch as Chatterton himſelf was accuſtomed to make (y).

(y) See Milles's Rowley, p. 429, Tyrwhitt's Vindication, p. 135, Monthly Review, by Badcock, for March 1782.

VIII. The very exiſtence of any ſuch perſon as ROWLEY is queſtioned, and upon apparently good ground. He is not ſo much as noticed by William of Worceſtre, who lived nearly about the ſuppoſed time of Rowley, was himſelf of Briſtol, and makes frequent mention of Canynge. "Bale, who lived two hundred years nearer to Rowley than we, and who, by unwearied induſtry, dug a thouſand bad authors out of obſcurity," has never taken the leaſt notice of ſuch a perſon (z); nor yet Leland, Pitts, or Tanner, nor indeed any other literary biographer. That no copies of any of his works ſhould exiſt, but thoſe depoſited in Redcliffe church, is alſo an unaccountable circumſtance not eaſy to be ſurmounted (a).

(z) Walpole's two letters, p. 31.

(a) Tyrwhitt's Vindication, p. 119. 121.

IX. Objections are even made to the manner in which the poems are ſaid to have been preſerved. That title deeds relating to the church or even hiſtorical records might be lodged in the muniment room of Redcliffe church, is allowed to be ſufficiently probable; but that poems ſhould have been conſigned to a cheſt with ſix keys, kept in a private room in a church with title deeds and conveyances, and that theſe keys ſhould be intruſted, not to the Heads of a College, or any Literary Society, but to Aldermen and Churchwardens, is a ſuppoſition replete with abſurdity; and the improbability is increaſed, when we conſider that theſe very papers paſſed through the hands of perſons of ſome literature, of Chatterton's father in particular, who had a taſte for poetry, and yet without the leaſt diſcovery of their intrinſic value (b).

(b) See Monthly Review for March 1782.

Internal Evidence.

I. In point of STYLE, COMPOSITION, and SENTIMENT, it is urged by Mr. Warton, and thoſe who adopt the ſame ſide of the controverſy, that the poems of Rowley are infinitely ſuperior to every other production of the century which is ſaid to have produced them. Our ancient poets are minute and particular, they do not deal in abſtraction and general exhibition, but dwell on realities; but the writer of theſe poems adopts ideal terms and artificial modes of explaining a fact, and employs too frequently the aid of metaphor and perſonification (c). Our ancient bards abound in unnatural conceptions, ſtrange imaginations, and even the moſt ridiculous inconſiſtencies; but Rowley's Poems preſent us with no incongruous combinations, no mixture of manners, inſtitutions, uſages and characters: they contain no violent or groſs improprieties (d). One of the ſtriking characteriſtics of old Engliſh poetry, is a continued tenor of diſparity. In Gower, Chaucer, and Lydgate, elegant deſcriptions, ornamental images, &c. bear no proportion to pages of languor, mediocrity, proſaic and unintereſting details; but the poems in queſtion are uniformly ſupported, and are throughout poetical and animated (e). Poetry, like other ſciences (ſay theſe critics) has its gradual acceſſions and advancements; and the poems in queſtion poſſeſs all that elegance, firmneſs of contexture, ſtrength and brilliancy, which did not appear in our poetry before the middle of the preſent century.

(e) Ibid. p. 20; Monthly Review, May 1782.

II. There appears in theſe poems none of that LEARNING, which peculiarly marks all the compoſitions of the fifteenth century. Our old poets are perpetually confounding Gothic and claſſical alluſions: Ovid and St. Auſtin are ſometimes cited in the ſame line. A ſtudious eccleſiaſtic of that period would give us a variety of uſeleſs authorities from Ariſtotle, from Boethius, and from the Fathers: and the whole would be interſperſed with alluſions to another kind of reading, viz. the old romances. The round table, with Sir

"ton's abilities, HE thinks him to have been incapable of writing the Battle of Haſtings, or any of thoſe "Poems produced by him under the name of Rowley."

"It appears to me that I cannot poſſibly, all this time, have been noticing what does not relate to me, becauſe Chatterton's Siſter, when ſhe thanks me in a Letter dated April the 20th, 1781, for what I ſent her and her Mother, through Mr. Ruddall, ſays, that "the only benefits they have reaped from the labours "of her dear Brother," are what they have received from me.

"Convey this to Mr. Warton, if you chooſe it, with many thanks for the pleaſure I have received from his Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry; and believe me to be,

"Dear Sir,

"Your obliged friend,

"HERBERT CROFT, jun."

Lincoln's-Inn,
Feb. 5, 1782.

Launcelott, and Sir Triſtram, and Charlemagne, would have been conſtantly cited (f). Poems from ſuch an author, would alſo have occaſionally exhibited prolix devotional epiſodes, mingled with texts of Scripture, and addreſſes to the Saints and bleſſed Virgin; inſtead of apoſtrophes to ſuch allegorical divinities as Truth and Content, and others of Pagan original (g).

(f) Warton's Inquiry, 21. 97. 99.

(g) Ibid. 93.

As to the hiſtorical alluſions which are really found in theſe poems, it is aſſerted, that they are only ſuch as might be ſupplied by books which are eaſily obtained, ſuch as Hollingſhead and Fox, Fuller's Church Hiſtory, Geofry of Monmouth, and others of a ſimilar nature (h); and that general reading has been miſtaken for profound erudition (i).

(h) Matthias's Eſſay, p. 69. An Examination of Rowley's Poems, p. 24.

(i) Warton's Inquiry.

III. Some ANACHRONISMS have alſo been pointed out in the manuſcripts of Rowley. Thus the art of knitting ſtockings is alluded to in the Tragedy of Ella [MM]; whereas it is a well eſtabliſhed fact, that the art was utterly unknown in the reign of Edward IV. Briſtol is called a city, though it was not ſuch till long after the death of that monarch. Canynge is ſaid to have poſſeſſed a cabinet of coins, drawings, &c. though theſe words were not then in uſe; and manuſcripts are ſpoken of as rarities, at a time when there were ſcarcely any other books: when, in truth, a printed book muſt have been a much greater curioſity (k).

(k) Curſory Obſervations on Rowley's Poems, p. 22—25.

IV. The METRE of the old Engliſh poetry is ſaid to be totally different from that of Rowley. The ſtanza in which the majority of theſe poems are written, conſiſts of ten lines, the two firſt quatrains of which rhyme alternately, and it cloſes with an alexandrine; no example of which occurs in Chaucer, Lydgate or Gower. Spencer extended the old octavo ſtanza to nine lines, cloſing with an alexandrine, to which Prior added a tenth (l). Above all, the extraordinary inſtance of an Engliſh Pindaric in the fifteenth century, is ridiculed by Mr. Warton, which novelty (he ſays) "was reſerved for the capricious ambition of Cowley's muſe." That Rowley ſhould ever have ſeen the original model of this irregular ſtyle of compoſition, is utterly improbable, ſince Pindar was one of the laſt claſſics that emerged at the reſtoration of literature (m).

(m) Warton's Inquiry, p. 33, 39.

To this head may be referred the extraordinary ſmoothneſs of the verſe, which is utterly unparalleled in any Poet for more than a century after the ſuppoſed age of Rowley (n); the accent or cadence, which is always modern; and the perfection and harmony of the rhyme (o).

(n) Curſory Obſervations, p. 5.

(o) Matthias's Eſſay, p. 67.

V. While the compoſition, metre, &c. are wholly modern, the LANGUAGE is aſſerted to be too ancient for the date of the poems. It is not the language of any particular period, but of two entire centuries (p). The diction and verſification are at perpetual variance (q). The author appears to have borrowed all his ancient language, not from the uſage of common life, but from Speght, Skinner, and other lexicographers, and to have copied their miſtakes (r). He has even introduced words which never made a part of the Engliſh language, and which are evidently the comage of fancy, analogy, or miſtake (s).

(p) Curſory Obſervations, p. 32.

(q) Warton's Inquiry, p. 42.

(s) Ibid.

VI. Notwithſtanding this affectation of ancient language, it is added, that the tinſel of MODERN PHRASEOLOGY may in too many inſtances be detected. Thus ſuch phraſes as "Puerilitie; before his optics; blameleſs tongue; the aucthoure of the piece; veſſel wreckt upon the tragic ſand; the proto-ſleyne man," &c. could not be the language of the fifteenth century. We find alſo a number of modern formularies and combinations, e. g. "Syſters in ſorrow; poygnant arrowes typp'd with deſtinie; Oh, Goddes! Now by the Goddes; Ah, what avaulde; Awaie, awaie! (which is the cant of modern tragedy) Oh, thou, whate'er thie name;" with a number of compound epithets (t), and other almoſt certain marks of modern compoſition (u).

(t) Warton's Inquiry, p. 23, 24.

(u) Curſory Obſervations, p. 12, 13.

VIII. To theſe may be added ſome paſſages which appear to be imitations of modern poets. Many of thoſe, which have been cited to convict Chatterton of plagiariſm, are, it muſt be confeſſed, ſuch obvious thoughts, that they might be adopted by a perſon who had never ſeen the modern publications in which they appear; but ſuch coincidences as the following are palpable:

The advocates of Rowley, are, however, not deſtitute of arguments in their ſupport. I ſhall therefore divide the evidence in the ſame manner as in ſtating the former, and endeavour to exhibit as fair a ſummary as poſſible.

ARGUMENTS TO PROVE THAT THE POEMS ATTRIBUTED TO ROWLEY, WERE REALLY WRITTEN BY HIM AND OTHERS IN THE 15th CENTURY.

External Evidence.

I. The firſt grand argument which the advocates on this ſide advance, is the conſtant and uniform aſſertion (except in a ſingle inſtance) of Chatterton himſelf, who is repreſented by his ſiſter, and all his intimates, as a lover of truth from the earlieſt dawn of reaſon. He was alſo moſt inſatiable of fame, and abounded in vanity. He felt himſelf neglected, and many paſſages of his writings are full of invective on this ſubject. Is it probable, that ſuch a perſon ſhould barter the fair character of truth, which he loved, for the ſake of perſiſting in falſehood, which he deteſted? Is it probable, that a perſon of his conſummate vanity, ſhould uniformly give the honour of all his more excellent compoſitions to another, and only inſcribe his name to thoſe which were evidently inferior? But even though a man might be thus careleſs of his reputation during his life time, under the conviction that he might aſſume the honour whenever he pleaſed, would this careleſſneſs continue even at the hour of death? Would he at a moment, when he actually meditated his own deſtruction; in a paper which he inſcribes—" All this wrote between eleven and two o'clock Saturday (Evening), in the utmoſt diſtreſs of mind,"—ſtill repeat with the utmoſt ſolemnity the ſame falſe aſſertion that he had affirmed during the former part of his life? There was at leaſt no occaſion to introduce the ſubject at that time, and he might have been ſilent, if he did not chuſe to cloſe his exiſtence with a direct falſehood (y). If we conſider the joy which he manifeſted on the diſcovery of the parchments, the avidity with which he read them, he muſt be the moſt complete of diſſemblers, if really they contained no ſuch treaſure as he pretended. To another very extraordinary cir-

cumſtance

cumſtance Mr. Catcott has pledged himſelf, which is, that on his firſt acquaintance with Chatterton, the latter mentioned by name almoſt all the poems which have ſince appeared in print, and that at a time, when, if he were the author, one-tenth of them could not be written (z).

(z) Ibid. 548.

II. Next to the aſſeverations of Chatterton himſelf, we are bound to pay at leaſt ſome attention to thoſe of all his friends. His mother accurately remembers the whole tranſaction concerning the parchments, as I have already ſtated it. His ſiſter alſo recollects to have ſeen the original parchment of the poem on our Lady's Church, and, ſhe thinks, of the Battle of Haſtings: ſhe remembers to have heard her brother mention frequently the names of Turgot, and of John Stowe, beſides that of Rowley. (a) Mr. Smith, who was one of the moſt intimate friends of Chatterton, remembers to have ſeen manuſcripts upon vellum, to the number of a dozen in his poſſeſſion, many of them ornamented with the heads of kings or of popes, and ſome of them as broad as the bottom of a large ſized chair (b). He uſed frequently to read to Mr. Smith, ſometimes parts, and ſometimes whole treatiſes from theſe old manuſcripts; and Mr. Smith has very often been preſent while he tranſcribed them at Mr. Lambert's (c). Mr. Capel, a Jeweller, at Briſtol, aſſured Mr. Bryant, that he had frequently called upon Chatterton, while at Mr. Lambert's, and had at times found him tranſcribing ancient manuſcripts anſwering to the former deſcription (d). Mr. Thiſtlethwaite, in the curious letter already quoted, relates, that during the year 1768, "at divers viſits, he found Chatterton employed in copying Rowley from what he ſtill conſiders as undoubted originals (e)." Mr. Carey alſo, another intimate acquaintance, frequently heard Chatterton mention theſe manuſcripts ſoon after he left Colſton's ſchool. Every one of theſe Gentlemen, as well as Mr. Clayfield and Mr. Ruddall, declare unequivocally, from an intimate knowledge of Chatterton's learning and abilities, that they believe him incapable of producing the poems of Rowley.

(e) Milles's Rowley, p. 457.

III. That a number of manuſcripts were found in Redcliffe church, cannot poſſibly be doubted after the variety of evidence which has been produced to that purpoſe. Perrot, the old Sexton, who ſucceeded Chatterton's great uncle, took Mr. Shiercliffe, a Miniature Painter, of Briſtol, as early as the year 1749, through Redcliffe church; he ſhewed him in the North porch a number of parchments, ſome looſe and ſome tied up, and intimated, "that there were things there, which would one day be better known; and that in proper hands, they might prove a treaſure (f)." Many of the manuſcripts in Mr. Barrett's hands bear all the marks of age, and are "ſigned by Rowley himſelf. The characters in each inſtance appear to be ſimilar; and the hand-writing the ſame in all [NN]."

(f) Bryant's Obſerv. p. 513.

IV. The ſhort time which Chatterton had to produce all theſe poems, is an extraordinary circumſtance. It has been already ſtated, that he continued at Colſton's ſchool from the age of eight till that of fourteen and ſeven months: that he continued each day in ſchool from ſeven or eight o'clock till twelve in the morning, and from one till four or five in the evening, and went to bed at eight. There is alſo reaſon to believe, that he did not diſcover or begin to copy theſe poems, or even to apply himſelf to antiquities, before the age of fifteen. In about the ſpace therefore of two years and a half, he made himſelf maſter of the ancient language of this country; he produced more than two volumes of poetry, which are publiſhed, and about as many compoſitions, in proſe and verſe, as would nearly fill two volumes more. During this time he muſt have read a conſiderable variety of books. He was ſtudying medicine, heraldry, and other ſciences; he was practicing drawing; he copied a large book of precedents; and Mr. Lambert's buſineſs, though not extenſive, muſt have occupied at leaſt ſome part of his attention. Which, therefore, is the eaſier ſuppoſition, ſay the advocates for Rowley, that this almoſt miracle of induſtry or ability was performed by a boy; or that Chatterton really copied the poems from ancient documents [OO]?

V. Chatterton

[NN] And the hand writing the ſame in all.] Mr. Barrett, and he only, has it in his power finally to determine the controverſy concerning Rowley's Poems. Let him produce all the manuſcripts which he obtained from Chatterton, and let them be put into the hands of ſome perſons converſant in old writings, who may poſſibly be able to decide concerning the probable date of the hand-writing. O.

(15) Bryant's Obſerv. p. 548.

[OO] Or that Chatterton really copied the Poems from ancient documents.] Of theſe old writings, which he is ſuppoſed to have tranſcribed from obſcure and almoſt illegible manuſcripts, (excluſive of his miſcellaneous and political writings,) the poetical alone fills 288 octavo pages in Mr. Tyrwhitt's edition; and perhaps there are others, with a quantity of proſe writings which might fill another ſuch volume. See Milles's edition, p. 438.

Theſe muſt have been tranſcribed by him, either in Mr. Lambert's office, or during the few hours he ſpent at home with his mother in an evening. Neither Mr. Lambert, nor his mother or ſiſter, take upon them to ſay, that they ever ſaw him this way employed. When not engaged in the immediate buſineſs of his profeſſion, he was employed by his maſter to copy forms and precedents, as well to improve him in the law as to keep him employed. Of theſe law forms and precedents, Mr. Lambert has in his poſſeſſion a folio book containing 334 pages, cloſely written by Chatterton; alſo 36 pages in another. In the noting book, 36 notarial acts; and in the letter book, 38 letters copied.

Add to all this his own acknowledged compoſitions, filling 240 pages in the printed copy, and perhaps as many more in manuſcript not yet publiſhed.

The greateſt part of theſe compoſitions, both under Rowley's name and his own, was written before he went to London, in April 1770, he being then

V. Chatterton is ſaid farther to have diſcovered great marks of ignorance on the manuſcripts coming firſt into his poſſeſſion. He read the name Roulie inſtead of Rowley, till he was ſet right by Mr. Barrett (g). In the acknowledged writings of Chatterton, there are alſo palpable miſtakes, and marks of ignorance in hiſtory, geography, &c. whereas no ſuch appear in the poems of Rowley (h). But what is of ſtill greater conſequence, Mr. Bryant has laboured to prove, that in almoſt innumerable inſtances, Chatterton did not underſtand the language of Rowley, but that he has actually miſinterpreted, and ſometimes miſtranſcribed him. Thus in "the Engliſh metamorphoſis," ver. 14.

(g) Remarks on Warton, p. 9.

(h) Bryant's Obſ. p. 477.

"Their myghte is knopped ynne the froſte of fere."

Chatterton having recourſe to Chaucer and Skinner, has interpreted to knop, to tie, or faſten; whereas it really means, and the context requires that it ſhould mean, to nip. Thus in the Second Battle of Haſtings, 548, deſcribing a ſacrifice:

"Roaſtynge their vyctualle round about the flame;"

which Mr. Tyrwhitt himſelf has allowed ought to be vyctimes, and has accordingly cancelled the other word. Thus in Ella, v. 678, we find:

"Theyre throngynge corſes ſhall onlyghte the ſtarres."

The word onlyghte, Chatterton has here ſtrangely applied as meaning to darken the ſtars, whereas Mr. Bryant, by recurring to the Saxon, very reaſonably ſuppoſes onlych to have been the proper word, and the line will then mean to be like, or to equal the ſtars in number. The word cheriſaunei, which Chatterton has inſerted in the "Introductionne to Ella," never did really exiſt, and Mr. Bryant ſhews that the original word was certainly cheriſaunce: and in the Second Eclogue, Chatterton has explained the word amenuſed, by leſſened, or diminiſhed; whereas the ſame able critic ſhews, that it never had any ſuch meaning, but that it really ſignifies accurſed or abominable. Theſe and other ſimilar miſtakes (of which Mr. Bryant ſpecifies a great number) he aſſerts, could never have happened, had Chatterton been any more than the mere tranſcriber of theſe extraordinary poems (*).

(*) See Mr. Bryant's Obſervations, paſſim.

VI. With reſpect to the objection, that Rowley is not mentioned by other writers, it is anſwered, that there exiſted ſo little communication among mankind at that time, that Leland, who is a very curious writer, never makes the ſmalleſt mention of Canynge, Lydgate, or Occleve: That William of Worceſtre, does not mention Rowley, becauſe, unleſs hiſtory demands it, writers do not commonly commemorate perſons before their death, and Rowley was apparently alive when William of Worceſtre was at Briſtol. In the regiſter of the Dioceſe of Wells, however, there are two perſons of the name of Thomas Rowley, mentioned as admitted into Holy Orders, one of whom might be the author of the poems (i). In anſwer to the objection, why theſe manuſcripts remained ſo long unknown to the world, Mr. Bryant ſays, "We may not be able to account any more for theſe manuſcripts being ſo long neglected, than for thoſe of Heſychius, Phædrus, and Velleius Paterculus having been in the ſame ſituation (k):" and with reſpect to the ſecreting of the originals by Chatterton, it is deemed a ſufficient reply, that he might conceive very highly of their value, and therefore did not wiſh to part with them, or he might be apprehenſive that they would be taken from him; and at laſt, in his indignation againſt the world, he probably deſtroyed all of them that remained at the time when he determined upon putting an end to his exiſtence.

(i) Mr. Bryant's Obſ. p. 535-543-544.

(k) Ibid. p. 499.

VII. The conceſſions of the adverſaries ought not to paſs unnoticed on this occaſion. Mr. Warton admits, "that ſome poems written by Rowley might have been preſerved in Canynge's cheſt; but if there were any, they were ſo enlarged and improved by Chatterton, as to become entirely new compoſitions (l);" and in a ſubſequent publication, he ſays, "I will not deny that Chatterton might diſcover parchments of humble proſe, containing local memoirs and authentic deeds, illuſtrating the hiſtory of Briſtol. He might have diſcovered biographical diaries, or other notices of the lives of Canynge, Iſcham, and Gorges." Theſe conceſſions at leaſt imply ſomething of a doubt on the mind of the Laureat, concerning the exiſtence of ſome important manuſcripts, and ſeem of ſome conſideration in the ſcale of controverſy.

aged 17 years and five months; and of the former, Rowley's pieces, they were almoſt all exhibited a twelve month earlier, before April 1769.

Now the time taken up in preparing the parchment and imitating the old writing, muſt probably have been greater than the time ſpent in compoſing them. If he was in poſſeſſion of the originals, ſurely he would not have beſtowed all this time and pains in tranſcribing from originals, which he might have parted with to greater advantage; and if he did tranſcribe them, why deſtroy the greateſt part of them, and exhibit only ſcraps and detached lines, for ſuch only appear now to exiſt? O.

Inter-

Internal Evidence in favour of the authenticity of Rowley's Poems.

I. The internal evidence (which we may call poſitive) on this ſide of the queſtion is not very extenſive, and the bulk of it conſiſts in negative arguments, or a refutation of the adverſaries' objections. The moſt material proof is derived from the ALLUSIONS TO FACTS and CUSTOMS, of which there is not much probability, that Chatterton could have a competent knowledge. Thus, if the "Dethe of Sir Charles Bawdin" be ſuppoſed, as Mr. Tyrwhitt himſelf thinks probable, to refer to the execution of Sir Baldwin of Fulford, the fact meets confirmation in all its circumſtances, from a fragment publiſhed by Hearne, and alſo from a parliamentary roll of the eighth of Edward IV. neither of which there is the leaſt probability that Chatterton ever ſaw (m). Thus the names which occur in the Battle of Haſtings, may almoſt all be authenticated from the old hiſtorians; but they are ſcattered in ſuch a variety of books, that they could not be extracted without infinite labour, and ſeveral of the books were in all probability not acceſſible by Chatterton.

(m) Obſervations on Rowley's Poems, p. 14.

To this head we may refer many particulars concerning Canynge, &c. as related by Chatterton; ſuch as his paying 3000 marks to the king, pro pace ſua habenda, &c. which are confirmed in an extraordinary manner by W. of Worceſtre, whoſe book was not made public till 1778, and which it was therefore impoſſible Chatterton could ſee previouſly to the publication of his memoirs. Such is alſo the time of Canynge's entering into Holy Orders, which is confirmed by the Epiſcopal regiſter of Worceſter; and the anecdote of the ſteeple of Redcliffe church being burnt down by lightning in 1446. Of a ſimilar kind is a circumſtance in the orthography of the name Feſcampe, (which is the right orthography,) while Holingſhead, the only author acceſſible to Chatterton, has it Fliſchampe. The name of Robert Conſul alſo, whom Rowley repreſents as having repaired the caſtle of Briſtol, occurs in Leland, as the proprietor of that Caſtle (n).

(n) See Bryant's Obſerv. p. 314, 326. 343, &c.

II. With regard to the STYLE, COMPOSITION, and SENTIMENT. If the poems appear ſuperior to the efforts of the firſt ſcholars at the revival of letters; what are they, when conſidered as the productions of an uneducated charity boy, not quite ſeventeen? Thoſe alſo who think that Chatterton could not reduce his genius to the ſtandard of the age of Rowley, ſhould, perhaps, rather wonder why he could never raiſe his own avowed productions to an equal degree of excellence [PP]. The poems attributed to Rowley, if his, are as much the work of his infantine years, as his own miſcellaneous poems: indeed, many of the latter were compoſed ſome time after moſt of Rowley's were exhibited to the world. That they ſhould be inferior in every excellence of poetry, is therefore a myſtery not eaſy to be accounted for. Againſt the general propoſition, that poetry like other arts is progreſſive, and never arrived to perfection in an early age; it has been judiciouſly urged, that "Genius is peculiar neither to age nor country," but that we have an example of one man (Homer,) who in the very infancy of all arts, without guide or precurſor, "gave to the world a work, which has been the admiration and model of all ſucceeding poets (o)." And though it be admitted, that Rowley's poems are pervaded by an uniform ſtrain of excellence and taſte, which does not appear in the other works of his age now extant, yet when we compare any compoſition with another of the ſame or of any prior age, the difference ſubſiſting, will frequently be found not to depend upon time, but upon the ſituation, genius and judgment of the reſpective authors (p).

(p) Ibid. p. 72.

III. As to METRE, it is ſaid, that in all languages the modes and meaſures of verſe were originally invented and adopted from accidental circumſtances, and agreeably to the taſte of different authors; and that very early in the Engliſh poetry, a great variety of meaſures are known to have prevailed. Such is the octave ſtanza, which is not many removes from the uſual ſtanza of Rowley, the ſeven lined ſtanza, or Rithm Royal, and that of ten lines uſed by Chaucer in one of his ſmaller poems. The argument founded on the ſmoothneſs of the verſe, is attempted to be overturned by Mr. Bryant, who has produced extracts from poems ſtill older than the age of Rowley, which are deficient neither in harmony nor cadence (q).

(q) Obſervations, p. 425, &c. 552.

IV. The objection founded on the ancient LANGUAGE of Rowley, is anſwered by ſuppoſing that his language was probably provincial (r). Several of the words objected to as of Chatterton's coining, have by more profound reſearches been traced in ancient writers. Many words in Rowley's poems cannot be found in thoſe Dictionaries and Gloſſaries, to which Chatterton had acceſs (s); and Chatterton's miſtakes in tranſcribing and explaining the old language of Rowley, have already been inſtanced.

(r) Ibid. p. 1, to 25.

(s) Matthias's Eſſay, p. 77.

V. Many of the pretended IMITATIONS of THE MODERN poets to be found in Rowley, are objected to upon good grounds, as being ideas obvious to Rowley or any man; and as to the others, why may we not ſuppoſe them, "inſertions of Chatterton, either to pleaſe his own ear, or to reſtore ſome parts which were loſt, or in places where the [PP] To an equal degree of excellence.] The moſt eſſential difference that ſtrikes me between the Poems of Rowley and Chatterton is, that the former are always built upon ſome conſiſtent intereſting plot, and are more uniformly excellent in the execution; the latter are irregular ſallies upon ill-ſelected or trifling ſubjects.

(t) Ibid. p. 105. words were difficult to be decyphered (t)?" This argument acquires great weight, when the temper and genius of Chatterton is conſidered, and when it is recollected that all parties agree in the probability of many interpolations being made by him; and if this argument be admitted, it will in a great meaſure account for the modern phraſeology which ſo frequently occurs in theſe poems.

In rejoinder to theſe arguments, a few facts have been ſtated by thoſe who ſupport the title of Chatterton. 1ſt. That no writings or cheſt depoſited in Redcliffe church are mentioned in Mr. Canynge's will, which has been carefully inſpected, nor any books except two, called "Liggers cum integra legenda," which he leaves to be uſed occaſionally in the choir by the two Chaplains eſtabliſhed by him (u). 2d. To account for Chatterton's extenſive acquaintance with old books out of the common line of reading, it is alledged that the old library at Briſtol was, during his life time, of univerſal acceſs, and Chatterton was actually introduced to it by the Rev. Mr. Catcott (w). 3d. Chatterton's account of Canynge, &c. as far as it is countenanced by William of Worceſtre, (that is, as far as reſpects his taking orders and paying a fine to the King) may be found in the epitaph on Maſter Canynge, ſtill remaining to be read by every perſon, both in Latin and Engliſh, in Redcliffe church, which indeed appears to be the authority, that William of Worceſtre himſelf has followed. Chatterton's account alſo of Redcliffe ſteeple, is to be found at the bottom of a print of that church, publiſhed in 1746, by one John Halfpenny, "in which was recounted the ruin of the ſteeple in 1446, by a tempeſt and fire (x)." 4th. As to the old vellum or parchment on which Chatterton tranſcribed his fragments, it is obſerved, that "at the bottom of each ſheet of old deeds, (of which there were many in the Briſtol cheſt) there is uſually a blank ſpace of about four or five inches in breadth;" and this exactly agrees with the ſhape and ſize of the largeſt fragment which he has exhibited, viz. Eight and a half inches long, and four and a-half broad (y).

(x) Tywrhitt's Vindication, p. 113. 212.

(y) Curſory Obſervations, p. 29.

Thus I have exhibited, as faithfully as I was able, an abſtract of the arguments on both ſides of this curious literary queſtion. To the examination I ſat down with a ſceptical mind; nor can I recollect being influenced during the progreſs of the inquiry in a ſingle inſtance, by the authority of names, by the force of ridicule, or the partialities of friendſhip. Some remarks, I believe, I may have added, which are not to be found in other books. In this, however, I am not conſcious of having favoured one party more than the other, but eſteemed it a part of my duty to ſtate the obſervations as they roſe in my mind from a conſideration of the facts. I ſhall not intrude upon my readers any verdict of my own concerning the iſſue of the controverſy; ſince my only intention was to enable them, from a view of the arguments, to form their own concluſions; leaving them ſtill open to the impreſſion of any additional or more ſatisfactory evidence that may hereafter ariſe. I cannot, however, lay aſide my pen without one general reflection. It is impoſſible to peruſe the ſtate of this controverſy, without ſmiling at the folly and vanity of poſthumous fame. The author of theſe poems, whoever he was, certainly never flattered himſelf with the expectation that they would ever excite half the curioſity, or half the admiration which they have excited in the literary world. If they really be the productions of Rowley, one of the firſt, both in order and in merit of our Engliſh Poets, is defrauded of more than half his reputation: if they be the works of Chatterton, they neither ſerved to raiſe him in the opinion of his intimate acquaintance and friends, nor to procure for him the comforts or even the neceſſaries of life. He has deſcended to his grave with a dubious character; and the only praiſe which can be accorded him by the warmeſt of his admirers, is that of an elegant and ingenious impoſtor. For the ſatisfaction of thoſe readers, who may wiſh to review the whole controverſy at large, and for the information of poſterity, I ſubjoin the moſt accurate liſt I have been able to procure of all the publications which have appeared on both ſides [2Q].

LETTER I.

London, April 26, 1770.

Dear Mother,

HERE I am, ſafe, and in high ſpirits—To give you a journal of my tour would not be unneceſſary. After riding in the baſket to Briſlington, I mounted the top of the coach, and rid eaſy, and agreeably entertained with the converſation of a Quaker in dreſs, but little ſo in perſonals and behaviour. This laughing friend, who is a Carver, lamented his having ſent his tools to Worceſter, as otherwiſe he would have accompanied me to London. I left him at Bath; when, finding it rained pretty faſt, I entered an inſide paſſenger to Speenhamland, the halfway ſtage, paying ſeven ſhillings. 'Twas lucky I did ſo, for it ſnowed all night, and on Marlborough Downs the ſnow was near a foot high.

At ſeven in the morning I breakfaſted at Speenhamland, and then mounted the coach-box for the remainder of the day, which was a remarkable fine one.—Honeſt gee-ho complimented me with aſſuring me, that I ſat bolder and tighter than any perſon who ever rid with him.—Dined at Stroud moſt luxuriantly, with a young Gentleman who had ſlept all the preceding night in the machine; and an old mercantile genius, whoſe ſchool-boy ſon had a great deal of wit, as the father thought, in remarking that Windſor was as old as our Saviour's time.

Got into London about five o'clock in the evening—called upon Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Fell, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Dodſley. Great encouragement from them; all approved of my deſign;—ſhall ſoon be ſettled.—Call upon Mr. Lambert; ſhew him this, or tell him, if I deſerve a recommendation, he would oblige me to give me one—if I do not, it will be beneath him to take notice of me. Seen all aunts, couſins—all well—and I am welcome. Mr. T. Wenſley is alive, and coming home.—Siſter, grandmother, &c. &c. &c. remember.—I remain,

Your dutiful ſon,

T. Chatterton.

LETTER II.

Shoreditch, London, May 6, 1770.

Dear Mother,

I am ſurpriſed that no letter has been ſent in anſwer to my laſt. I am ſettled, and in ſuch a ſettlement as I would deſire. I get four guineas a month by one Magazine: ſhall engage to write a Hiſtory of England, and other pieces, which will more than double that ſum. Occaſional eſſays for the daily papers would more than ſupport me. What a glorious proſpect! Mr. Wilkes knew me by my writings ſince I firſt correſponded with the Bookſellers here. I ſhall viſit him next week, and by his intereſt will inſure Mrs. Ballance the Trinity-Houſe. He affirmed that what Mr. Fell had of mine could not be the writings of a youth; and expreſſed a deſire to know the author. By the means of another Bookſeller I ſhall be introduced to Townſhend and Sawbridge. I am quite familiar at the Chapter Coffee-houſe, and know all the geniuſes there. A character is now unneceſſary; an author carries his character in his pen. My ſiſter will improve herſelf in drawing. My grandmother is, I hope, well. Briſtol's mercenary walls were never deſtined to hold me—there, I was out of my element; now, I am in it—London! Good God! how ſuperior is London to that deſpicable place Briſtol!—Here is none of your little meanneſſes, none of your mercenary ſecurities, which diſgrace that miſerable hamlet.—Dreſs, which is in Briſtol an eternal fund of ſcandal, is here only introduced as a ſubject of praiſe; if a man dreſſes well, he has taſte; if careleſs, he has his own reaſons for ſo doing, and is prudent. Need I remind you of the contraſt? The poverty of authors is a common obſervation, but not always a true one. No author can be poor who underſtands the arts of Bookſellers—Without this neceſſary knowledge, the greateſt genius may ſtarve; and, with it, the greateſt dunce live in ſplendor. This knowledge I have pretty well dipped into.—The Levant man of war, in which T. Wenſley went out, is at Portſmouth; but no news from him yet.—I lodge in one of Mr. Walmſley's beſt rooms. Let Mr. Cary copy the letters on the other ſide, and give them to the perſons for whom they are deſigned, if not too much labour for him.

I remain, yours, &c.

T. Chatterton.

P. S. I have ſome trifling preſents for my mother, ſiſter Thorne, &c.

Sunday morning.

For Mr. T. CARY.

I have ſent you a taſk. I hope no unpleaſing one. Tell all your acquaintance for the future to read the Freeholder's Magazine. When you have any thing for publication, ſend it to me, and it ſhall moſt certainly appear in ſome periodical compilation. Your laſt piece was, by the ignorance of a corrector, jumbled under the conſiderations in the acknowledgements. But I reſcued it, and inſiſted on its appearance.

LETTER III.

King's Bench, for the preſent, May 14, 1770.

Dear Madam,

Don't be ſurprized at the name of the place. I am not here as a priſoner. Matters go on ſwimmingly: Mr. Fell having offended certain perſons, they have ſet his creditors upon him, and he is ſafe in the King's Bench. I have been bettered by this accident: His ſucceſſors in the Freeholder's Magazine, knowing nothing of the matter, will be glad to engage me, on my own terms. Mr. Edmunds has been tried before the Houſe of Lords, ſentenced to pay a fine, and thrown into Newgate. His misfortunes will be to me of no little ſervice. Laſt week, being in the pit of Drury Lane Theatre, I contracted an immediate acquaintance (which you know is no hard taſk to me) with a young Gentleman in Cheapſide; partner in a muſic-ſhop, the greateſt in the city. Hearing I could write, he deſired me to write a few ſongs for him: this I did the ſame night, and conveyed them to him the next morning. Theſe he ſhewed to a Doctor in Muſic, and I am invited to treat with this Doctor, on the footing of a compoſer, for Ranelagh and the Gardens. Bravo, hey boys, up we go!—Beſides the advantage of viſiting theſe expenſive and polite places gratis; my vanity will be fed with the ſight of my name in copper-plate, and my ſiſter will receive a bundle of printed ſongs, the words by her brother. Theſe are not all my acquiſitions: a Gentleman who knows me at the Chapter, as an author, would have introduced me as a companion to the young Duke of Northumberland, in his intended general tour. But, alas! I ſpeak no tongue but my own!—But to return once more to a place I am ſickened to write of, Briſtol. Though, as an apprentice, none had greater liberties, yet the thoughts of ſervitude killed me: now I have that for my labour, I always reckoned the firſt of my pleaſures, and have ſtill, my liberty. As to the clearance, I am ever ready to give it; but really I underſtand ſo little of the law, that I believe Mr. Lambert muſt draw it. Mrs. L. brought what you mention. Mrs. Hughes is as well as age will permit her to be, and my couſin does very well.

I will get ſome patterns worth your acceptance; and wiſh you and my ſiſter would improve yourſelves in drawing, as it is here a valuable and never-failing acquiſition.—My box ſhall be attended to; I hope my books are in it—if not, ſend them; and particularly Catcott's Hutchinſonian jargon on the Deluge, and the MS. Gloſſary, compoſed of one ſmall book, annexed to a larger.—My ſiſter will remember me to Miſs Sandford. I have not quite forgot her; though there are ſo many pretty milleners, &c that I have almoſt forgot myſelf.—Carty will think on me: upon inquiry, I find his trade dwindled into nothing here. A man may very nobly ſtarve by it; but he muſt have luck indeed, who can live by it.—Miſs Rumſey, if ſhe comes to London, would do well, as an old acquaintance, to ſend me her addreſs.—London is not Briſtol—We may patrole the town for a day, without raiſing one whiſper, or nod of ſcandal.—If ſhe refuſes, the curſe of all antiquated virgins light on her: may ſhe be refuſed, when ſhe ſhall requeſt! Miſs Rumſey will tell Miſs Baker, and Miſs Baker will tell Miſs Porter, that Miſs Porter's favoured humble ſervant, though but a young man, is a very old lover; and in the eight-and-fiftieth year of his age: but that, as Lappet ſays, is the flower of a man's days; and when a Lady can't get a young huſband, ſhe muſt put up with an old bed-fellow. I left Miſs Singer, I am ſorry to ſay it, in a very bad way; that is, in a way to be married.—But mum—Aſk Miſs Suky Webb the reſt; if ſhe knows, ſhe'll tell ye.—I beg her pardon for revealing the ſecret; but when the knot is faſtened, ſhe ſhall know how I came by it.—Miſs Thatcher may depend upon it, that, if I am not in love with her, I am in love with nobody elſe: I hope ſhe is well; and if that whining, ſighing, dying pulpit-fop, Lewis, has not finiſhed his languiſhing lectures, I hope ſhe will ſee her amoroſo next Sunday.—If Miſs Love has no objection to having a crambo ſong on her name publiſhed, it ſhall be done.—Begging pardon of Miſs Cotton for whatever has happened to offend her, I can aſſure her it has happened without my conſent. I did not give her this aſſurance when in Briſtol, leſt it ſhould ſeem like an attempt to avoid the anger of her furious brother. Inquire, when you can, how Miſs Broughton received her billet. Let my ſiſter ſend me a journal of all the tranſactions of the females within the circle of your acquaintance. Let Miſs Watkins know, that the letter ſhe made herſelf ridiculous by, was never intended for her; but another young Lady in the neighbourhood, of the ſame name. I promiſed, before my departure, to write to ſome hundreds, I believe; but, what with writing for publications, and going to places of public diverſion, which is as abſolutely neceſſary to me as food, I find but little time to write to you. As to Mr. Barrett, Mr. Catcott, Mr. Burgum, &c. &c. they rate literary lumber ſo low, that I believe an author, in their eſtimation, muſt be poor indeed! But here matters are otherwiſe: had Rowley been a Londoner, inſtead of a Briſtowyan, I could have lived by copying his works.—In my humble opinion, I am under very few obligations to any perſons in Briſtol: one, indeed, has obliged me; but, as moſt do, in a manner which makes his obligation no obligation.—My youthful acquaintances will not take it in dudgeon, that I do not write oftener to them, than I believe I ſhall: but, as I had the happy art of pleaſing in converſation, my company was often liked, where I did not like: and to continue a correſpondence under ſuch circumſtances, would be ridiculous. Let my ſiſter improve in copying muſic, drawing, and every thing which requires genius: in Briſtol's mercantile ſtyle thoſe things may be uſeleſs, if not a detriment.

detriment to her; but here they are highly profitable.—Inform Mr. Rhiſe that nothing ſhall be wanting, on my part, in the buſineſs he was ſo kind as to employ me in; ſhould be glad of a line from him, to know whether he would engage in the marine department; or ſpend the reſt of his days, ſafe, on dry ground.—Intended waiting on the Duke of Bedford relative to the Trinity-Houſe; but his Grace is dangerouſly ill. My grandmother, I hope, enjoys the ſtate of health I left her in. I am Miſs Webb's humble ſervant. Thorne ſhall not be forgot, when I remit the ſmall trifles to you. Notwithſtanding Mrs. B.'s not being able to inform me of Mr. Garſed's addreſs, through the cloſeneſs of the pious Mr. Ewer, I luckily ſtumbled upon it this morning.

I remain, &c. &c. &c. &c.

Monday Evening. Thomas Chatterton.

(Direct for me, at Mr. Walmſley's, at Shoreditch—only.)

LETTER IV.

Tom's Coffee-houſe, London, May 30, 1770.

Dear Siſter,

There is ſuch a noiſe of buſineſs and politicks in the room, that my inaccuracy in writing here, is highly excuſable. My preſent profeſſion obliges me to frequent places of the beſt reſort. To begin with, what every female converſation begins with, dreſs: I employ my money now in fitting myſelf faſhionably, and getting into good company; this laſt article always brings me in intereſt. But I have engaged to live with a Gentleman, the brother of a Lord (a Scotch one indeed), who is going to advance pretty deeply into the bookſelling branches: I ſhall have lodging and boarding, genteel and elegant, gratis: this article, in the quarter of the town he lives, with worſe accommodations, would be 50l. per annum. I ſhall have, likewiſe, no inconſiderable premium; and aſſure yourſelf every month ſhall end to your advantage: I will ſend you two ſilks this ſummer; and expect, in anſwer to this, what colours you prefer. My mother ſhall not be forgotten. My employment will be writing a voluminous Hiſtory of London, to appear in numbers the beginning of the next winter. As this will not, like writing political eſſays, oblige me to go to the coffee-houſe, I ſhall be able to ſerve you the more by it: but it will neceſſitate me to go to Oxford, Cambridge, Lincoln, Coventry, and every collegiate church near; not at all diſagreeable journeys, and not to me expenſive. The Manuſcript Gloſſary, I mentioned in my laſt, muſt not be omitted. If money flowed as faſt upon me as honours, I would give you a portion of 5000l. You have, doubtleſs, heard of the Lord Mayor's remonſtrating and addreſſing the King: but it will be a piece of news, to inform you that I have been with the Lord Mayor on the occaſion. Having addreſſed an eſſay to his Lordſhip, it was very well received; perhaps better than it deſerved; and I waited on his Lordſhip, to have his approbation, to addreſs a ſecond letter to him, on the ſubject of the remonſtrance, and its reception. His Lordſhip received me as politely as a citizen could; and warmly invited me to call on him again. The reſt is a ſecret—But the devil of the matter is, there's no money to be got of this ſide the queſtion. Intereſt is of the other ſide. But he is a poor author, who cannot write on both ſides. I believe I may be introduced (and, if I am not, I'll introduce myſelf) to a ruling power in the Court party. I might have a recommendation to Sir George Colebrook, an Eaſt-India Director, as qualified for an office no ways deſpicable; but I ſhall not take a ſtep to the ſea, whilſt I can continue on land. I went yeſterday to Woolwich, to ſee Mr. Wenſley; he is paid to-day. The artillery is no unpleaſing ſight, if we bar reflection, and do not conſider how much miſchief it may do. Greenwich Hoſpital and St. Paul's Cathedral are the only ſtructures which could reconcile me to any thing out of the Gothic. Mr. Carty will hear from me ſoon: multiplicity of literary buſineſs muſt be my excuſe.—I condole with him, and my dear Miſs Sandford, in the misfortune of Mrs. Carty: my phyſical advice is, to leech her temples plentifully: keep her very low in diet; as much in the dark as poſſible. Nor is this laſt preſcription the whim of an old woman: whatever hurts the eyes, affects the brain: and the particles of light, when the ſun is in the ſummer ſigns, are highly prejudicial to the eyes; and it is from this ſympathetic effect, that the headach is general in ſummer. But, above all, talk to her but little, and never contradict her in any thing. This may be of ſervice. I hope it will. Did a paragraph appear in your paper of Saturday laſt, mentioning the inhabitants of London's having opened another view of St. Paul's; and adviſing the corporation, or veſtry of Redclift, to procure a more compleat view of Redclift church? My compliments to Miſs Thatcher: if I am in love, I am; though the devil take me, if I can tell with whom it is. I believe I may addreſs her in the words of Scripture, which no doubt ſhe reveres; "If you had not ploughed with my heifer" (or bullock rather), "you had not found out my riddle." Humbly thanking Miſs Rumſey for her complimentary expreſſion, I cannot think it ſatisfactory. Does ſhe, or does ſhe not, intend coming to London? Mrs. O'Coffin has not yet got a place; but there is not the leaſt doubt but ſhe will in a little time.

Eſſay-writing has this advantage, you are ſure of conſtant pay; and when you have once wrote a piece which makes the author enquired after, you may bring the Bookſellers to your own terms. Eſſays on the patriotic ſide fetch no more than what the copy is ſold for. As the patriots themſelves are ſearching for a place, they have no gratuities to ſpare. So ſays one of the beggars, in a temporary alteration of mine, in the Jovial Crew:

A patriot was my occupation
It got me a name but no pelf:
Till, ſtarv'd for the good of the nation,
I begg'd for the good of myſelf.
Fal, lal, &c.

I told them, if 'twas not for me,
Their freedoms would all go to pot;
I promis'd to ſet them all free,
But never a farthing I got.
Fal, lal, &c.

—On the other hand, unpopular eſſays will not even be accepted; and you muſt pay to have them printed: but then you ſeldom loſe by it. Courtiers are ſo ſenſible of their deficiency in merit, that they generally reward all who know how to daub them with an appearance of it. To return to private affairs—Friend Slade may depend upon my endeavouring to find the publications you mention. They publiſh the Goſpel Magazine here. For a whim I write in it. I believe there are not any ſent to Briſtol; they are hardly worth the carriage—methodiſtical, and unmeaning. With the uſual ceremonies to my mother, and grandmother; and ſincerely, without ceremony, wiſhing them both happy; when it is in my power to make them ſo, they ſhall be ſo; and with my kind remembrance to Miſs Webb, and Miſs Thorne; I remain, as I ever was,

Yours, &c. to the end of the chapter,
Thomas Chatterton.

P. S. I am this minute pierced through the heart by the black eye of a young Lady, driving along in a Hackney-coach.—I am quite in love: if my love laſts till that time, you ſhall hear of it in my next.

LETTER V.

June 19, 1770.

Dear Siſter,

I have an horrid cold—The relation of the manner of my catching it may give you more pleaſure than the circumſtance itſelf. As I wrote very late Sunday night (or rather very early Monday morning), I thought to have gone to bed pretty ſoon laſt night: when, being half undreſſed, I heard a very doleful voice, ſinging Miſs Hill's favorite bedlamite ſong. The hum-drum of the voice ſo ſtruck me, that though I was obliged to liſten a long while before I could hear the words, I found the ſimilitude in the ſound. After hearing her with pleaſure drawl for above half an hour, ſhe jumped into a briſker tune, and hobbled out the ever-famous ſong, in which poor Jack Fowler was to have been ſatirized.—" I put " my hand into a buſh: I prick'd my finger to the " bone: I ſaw a ſhip ſailing along: I thought the " ſweeteſt flowers to find:" and other pretty flowery expreſſions, were twanged with no inharmonious bray.—I now ran to the window, and threw up the ſaſh; reſolved to be ſatisfied, whether or no it was the identical Miſs Hill, in propria perſona.—But, alas! it was a perſon whoſe twang is very well known, when ſhe is awake, but who had drank ſo much royal bob (the gingerbread-baker for that, you know), that ſhe was now ſinging herſelf aſleep. This ſomnifying liquor had made her voice ſo like the ſweet echo of Miſs Hill's, that if I had not conſidered that ſhe could not ſee her way up to London, I ſhould abſolutely have imagined it hers—There was a fellow and a girl in one corner, more buſy in attending to their own affairs, than the melody.

This part of the letter, for ſome lines, is not legible.

. . . . . the morning) from Marybone gardens; I ſaw the fellow in the cage at the watch-houſe, in the pariſh of St. Giles; and the nymph is an inhabitant of one of Cupid's inns of Court.—There was one ſimilitude it would be injuſtice to let ſlip. A drunken fiſhman, who ſells ſouſe mackarel, and other delicious dainties, to the eternal detriment of all two-penny ordinaries; as his beſt commodity, his ſalmon, goes off at three halfpence the piece: this itinerant merchant, this moveable fiſh-ſtall, having likewiſe had his doſe of bob-royal, ſtood ſtill for a while; and then joined chorus, in a tone which would have laid half a dozen lawyers, pleading for their fees, faſt aſleep: this naturally reminded me of Mr. Haythorne's ſong of

" Says Plato, who oy oy oy ſhould man be vain?"

However, my entertainment, though ſweet enough in itſelf, has a diſh of ſour ſauce ſerved up in it; for I have a moſt horrible wheezing in the throat: but I don't repent that I have this cold; for there are ſo many noſtrums here, that 'tis worth a man's while to get a diſtemper, he can be cured ſo cheap.

June 29th, 1770.

My cold is over and gone. If the above did not recall to your mind ſome ſcenes of laughter, you have loſt your ideas of riſibility.

LETTER VI. (*)

Dear Mother,

I ſend you in the box—ſix cups and ſaucers with two baſons, for my ſiſter—If a china tea pot and cream pot, is in your opinion, neceſſary, I will ſend them, but I am informed they are unfaſhionable, and that the red china, which you are provided with, is more in uſe—a cargo of patterns, for yourſelf, with a ſnuff box, right French and very curious in my opinion.

Two fans—the ſilver one, is more graver than the other, which would ſuit my ſiſter beſt—But that I leave to you both.

Some Britiſh herb ſnuff, in the box; be careful how you open it—(This I omit leſt it injure the other matters)

Some Britiſh herb tobacco for my grandmother, ſome trifles for Thorne. Be aſſured whenever I have the power, my will won't be wanting to teſtify, that I remember you—

Yours,

July 8, 1770. T. Chatterton.

N. B.—I ſhall foreſtall your intended journey, and pop down upon you at Chriſtmas—

I could have wiſhed, you had ſent my red pocket book, as 'tis very material.

(*) Chatterton had probably changed his lodging a little before he wrote this letter. It is a remarkable paſſage where he ſays, he wiſhes ſhe had ſent him up his red pocket book, " as 'tis very material." " More graver," in the 11th line, confirms Mr. Bryant's opinion, p. 481, " that he was not well grounded in the firſt principles of Grammar."

I bought two very curious twiſted pipes for my grandmother; but both breaking, I was afraid to buy others leſt they ſhould break in the box; and being looſe, injure the china. Have you heard any thing further of the clearance—

Direct for me at Mrs. Angels', Sack-maker, Brooke-ſtreet, Holborn.

" Mrs. Chatterton."

LETTER VII.

Dear Siſter,

I have ſent you ſome china and a fan. You have your choice of two. I am ſurpriſed that you choſe purple and gold. I went into the ſhop to buy it: but it is the moſt diſagreeable colour I ever ſaw—dead, lifeleſs, and inelegant. Purple and pink, or lemon and pink, are more genteel and lively. Your anſwer in this affair will oblige me. Be aſſured, that I ſhall ever make your wants, my wants; and ſtretch to the utmoſt to ſerve you. Remember me to Miſs Sandford, Miſs Rumſey, Miſs Singer, &c. &c. &c.

As to the ſongs, I have waited this week for them, and have not had time to copy one perfectly: when the ſeaſon's over, you will have 'em all in print. I had pieces laſt month in the following Magazines:

Goſpel Magazine,
Town and Country, viz.
Maria Friendleſs,
Falſe Step.
Hunter of Oddities,
To Miſs Buſh, &c.

Court and City. London. Political Regiſter, &c. &c.

The Chriſtian Magazine, as they are not to be had perfect, are not worth buying—I remain,

Yours,

July 11, 1770. T. Chatterton.

LETTER VIII.

I am now about an Oratorio, which, when finiſhed, will purchaſe you a gown. You may be certain of ſeeing me before the 1ſt of January, 1771.—The clearance is immaterial.—My mother may expect more patterns.—Almoſt all the next Town and Country Magazine is mine. I have an univerſal acquaintance:—my company is courted every where; and, could I humble myſelf to go into a compter, could have had twenty places before now:—but I muſt be among the great; ſtate matters ſuit me better than commercial. The Ladies are not out of my acquaintance. I have a deal of buſineſs now, and muſt therefore bid you adieu. You will have a longer letter from me ſoon—and more to the purpoſe.

Yours,

20th July, 1770. T. C.

The myſt'ries of a title I impart:
Teach the young author how to pleaſe the town;
And make the heavy drug of rhime go down.
Since Curl, immortal, never dying name,
A double pica in the book of fame,
By various arts did various dunces prop,
And tickled every fancy to his ſhop:

Who judges with the ſolid taſte of Cooke?
Villains exalted in the midway ſky,
Shall live again, to drain your purſes dry:

Nor yet unrivall'd they; ſee Baldwin comes;
Rich in inventions, patents, cuts and hums:
The honorable Boſwell writes, 'tis true,
What elſe can Paoli's ſupporter do?
The trading wits endeavour to attain,
Like bookſellers, the world's firſt idol—gain:
For this they puff the heavy Goldſmith's line,
And hail his ſentiment tho' trite, divine;
For this, the patriotic bard complains,
And Bingley binds poor liberty in chains:
For this was every reader's faith deceiv'd,
And Edmund ſwore what nobody believ'd:
For this the wits in cloſe diſguiſes fight;
For this the varying politicians write;
For this each month new magazines are ſold,
With dulneſs fill'd and tranſcripts of the old.
The Town and Country ſtruck a lucky hit,
Was novel, ſentimental, full of wit:
Apeing her walk, the ſame ſucceſs to find,
The Court and City hobbles far behind:
Sons of Apollo learn, merit's no more
Than a good frontiſpiece to grace her door;
The author who invents a title well,
Will always find his cover'd dullneſs ſell;
Flexney and every bookſeller will buy,—
Bound in neat calf, the work will never die.

What are their pleaſures when compar'd to mine?
Happy I eat and tell my num'rous pence,
Free from the ſervitude of rhime and ſenſe;

With joy to Britain's King and Sovereign dear:
And in compliance to an ancient mode,
Meaſures his ſyllables into an ode;
Yet ſuch the ſcurvy merit of his muſe,
He bows to Deans and licks his Lordſhip's ſhoes
Then leave the wicked barren way of rhime,
Fly far from poverty, be wiſe in time:
Regard the office more; Parnaſſus leſs,
Put your religion in a decent dreſs:
Then may your intereſt in the town advance,
Above the reach of muſes or romance.

APPENDIX, No. II.

VOL. IV. Page 544.

 [CRUDEN, (ALEXANDER), M. A. was the ſecond ſon of Mr. William Cruden, Merchant, and one of the Baillies of Aberdeen, an office ſimilar to that of Alderman in England, and was born in the year 1701. He received his education in the Grammar School of Aberdeen, and was a ſchoolfellow with the late George Earl Mariſchal, and James, afterwards the celebrated Field Mareſchal Keith, who in the ſchool catalogue were diſtinguiſhed by Dominus Georgius Keith, and Magiſter Jacobus Keith. At the expiration of the uſual number of years, Mr. Cruden entered as Student of Mariſcal College. From his cloſe attendance at the Divinity Lectures of Mr. Blackwell, father to the late Principal Blackwell, he appears to have had thoughts of the church, as a profeſſion; and although prevented by the melancholy change of mind which took place about this time, he preſerved through the whole of life the impreſſion that he was appointed by Heaven to preach the goſpel and reform mankind.

It is uncertain to what that inſanity which now appeared in his words and actions, and which with few intervals accompanied him to his grave, is to be attributed. Some thought it was occaſioned by the bite of a mad dog; but nothing can be gathered from the hiſtory of that dreadful diſtemper which favours this opinion. Others derived his madneſs from diſappointment in a love affair, but it is uncertain whether this operated as a cauſe or conſequence. Some uncommon circumſtances with which it was attended, however, will apologize for making mention of it in this place. The object of his affection was the daughter of a Clergyman of Aberdeen. Cruden courted her with enthuſiaſm and perſeverance, but the Lady thought proper to reject his addreſſes, and his behaviour becoming outrageous and troubleſome, her father ordered his doors to be ſhut againſt him. This increaſed his paſſion, and his friends ſoon found it neceſſary to confine him for a conſiderable time in priſon. The young Lady in the mean while became pregnant, which was with too much reaſon attributed to a criminal intercourſe with her own brother (a). She was ſent into the country, and never returned. That Mr. Cruden ſhared in the general horror which this event produced may be eaſily believed. He never mentioned the name of the unhappy woman but with the bittereſt grief and moſt tender compaſſion.

(a) As there are ſome relations of the parties yet living the names are omitted.

On his releaſe from confinement, he gave up the purſuit of his ſtudies at Aberdeen, and reſolved to leave his native country. In the year 1722 he came to London, and engaged in ſeveral families as private Tutor to young perſons at School, or who were intended for the Univerſity. In this employment he ſpent ſome years in the Iſle of Man. In the year 1732, we find him in London again, as corrector of the preſs, and bookſeller. His ſhop was under the Royal Exchange. While in this ſituation an incident happened which Mr. Cruden numbered among the moſt remarkable occurrences of his life. A Gentleman from Aberdeen (b), who wiſhed to ſerve Cruden, offered to introduce him to a Mer-a Merchant near the Royal Exchange, a near relation of the young Lady above-mentioned. When they knocked at the door of this Merchant's houſe, it was opened by the young Lady herſelf, who, unknown to Mr. Cruden or his friend, had found an aſylum here. Mr. Cruden ſtarted back, with viſible ſigns of wonder, and agony, and graſping his friend's hand, exclaimed wildly, "Ah! ſhe has ſtill her fine black eyes." It is perhaps unneceſſary to add, that his hopes of intimacy in this family were now at an end. He did not then, nor ever after, enter the houſe, nor court the acquaintance of its owner, who was indeed a younger brother of the Lady.

The year after, he began to compile the work which entitles him to be ranked among the friends of literature, and conſequently to a place in theſe records. He had long meditated "A Complete Concordance of the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Teſtament." If the merit of labour only be given to this work, it muſt be acknowledged that it required labour to which it is impoſſible to make any addition, and perſeverance that knows no interval. Mr. Cruden was well qualified for ſuch an undertaking; for habits of induſtry were familiar to him, and his inclination led him to form the plan and indeed to execute the whole before he had received any encouragement from the public. The firſt edition was publiſhed in the year 1737. The preface explains his plan and his views in publiſhing [A]. The book was dedicated to Queen Caroline, who had given the author ſome reaſon to expect a gratuity on its being preſented to her. But a very few days before its publication, the Queen died [B], and Cruden loſt his Patroneſs. His affairs were now embarraſſed; the time he had beſtowed on his work was not productive of immediate profit, and his reward was no longer to be expected; for that he did expect a reward from her Majeſty appeared by viſible ſymptoms of the keeneſt diſappointment. He diſpoſed of his ſtock in trade and ſhut up his ſhop. Without employment, without friends, and without hope, he became again a prey to his phrenetic diſorder, and it was found neceſſary to confine him in a private Madhouſe at Bethnal Green. As ſoon as he was releaſed he took revenge on his keepers, and on thoſe who were the cauſe of his confinement, by publiſhing a pamphlet, entitled "The London Citizen exceedingly injured, "giving an account of his adventures during the time of his ſevere and long campaign "at Bethnal Green, for nine weeks and ſix days, the Citizen being ſent thither in "March 1738, by Robert Wightman a notoriouſly conceited whimſical man, where he "was chained, hand-cuffed, ſtrait-waiſtcoated and impriſoned, &c. &c." He alſo commenced an action againſt Dr. Monro, and other defendants, which was tried in Weſtminſter-Hall, July 17, 1739, when a verdict was given in favour of the defendants. After [A] His views in publiſhing.] After reviewing the principal works of this kind which had appeared, Mr. Cruden ſays, "Thus it appears that we have "had Concordances to the Bible ſome centuries "ago; and the world has been ſo ſenſible of their "uſefulneſs, that many of them have been compoſed "and publiſhed in different languages. But as there "are ſeveral in our language, it may be enquired, "What occaſioned my undertaking this great and "laborious work, or what advantage it has above "any other hitherto publiſhed?

"When I firſt began this work, I deſigned to "compoſe an uſeful Concordance in octavo; but after "I had printed ſeveral ſpecimens, I found it neceſ-"ſary to alter my ſcheme, and to compile one to be "printed in this large volume, in order to make "thoſe improvements which now render it prefer-"able to any other.

"The method is eaſy and regular, and each text "of Scripture is generally contained in one line, "whereby the reader may readily find the place he "wants, if he remembers any material word. When "there are two or more texts of Scripture that are "parallel, I have generally mentioned the firſt that "occurs in order in the BIBLE, and have directly "added the parallel texts. It is printed with a good "letter, though pretty ſmall, which was neceſſary "in order to bring it into this volume, and make "it contain multum in parvo, much in a little com-"paſs; and great care has been taken that the "figures referring to the chapters and verſes of the "BIBLE be exact and correct. When a text is "marked with a †, it denotes a marginal reading.

"This CONCORDANCE is divided into three "alphabets. The firſt alphabet contains the appella-"tive or common words, which is the principal part. "It is very full and large, and any text may be "found by looking for any material word, whether "it be ſubſtantive, adjective, verb, &c.

"In this part I have given the various SIGNIFI-"CATIONS of the principal words, which, I hope, "will be eſteemed an uſeful improvement, there not "being any thing of this kind in the other large "Concordances: By this improvement the reader "will have many texts explained, and difficulties "removed; and the meaning of the Scripture may "be here known by that which is accounted the beſt "rule of interpreting Scripture, namely, by com-"paring one Scripture with another. There is ſo "large a collection of the various ſignifications of "many words in Scripture, as may, perhaps, be "not only uſeful to private Chriſtians, but alſo to "thoſe who preach the Goſpel, for hereby many "important things may be obſerved at one view, "without the trouble of turning over ſeveral volumes; "and occaſion is ſometimes taken to give an account "of the Jewiſh cuſtoms and ceremonies, by which "the reader is led into the meaning of many paſ-"ſages of Scripture, as may be ſeen in the words, "Elder, Ephod, Synagogue, &c.

"The ſecond alphabet contains the proper names "in the holy Scriptures, which the reader will re-"ceive with improvements, as in Abraham, David, "&c. The texts referred to, where thoſe names "are mentioned, give a ſhort hiſtorical account of "the remarkable things recorded in Scripture con-"cerning them. To this part is prefixed a table, "containing the ſignifications of the words in the "original languages from which they are derived.

"The third and laſt alphabet is a Concordance for "thoſe books that are called APOCRYPHAL, which "is only added that this work might not be defi-"cient in any thing that is treated of in any other "Corcordance; thoſe books not being of divine in-"ſpiration, nor any part of the Canon of Scripture, "and therefore are of no authority in the Church of "God (1)."

(1) Preface to the firſt edition.

[B] The Queen died.] Mr. Cruden ſays in a note to his Dedication, that it "was preſented Nov. 3, "1737, to her Majeſty, who departed this life the "20th of that very month." It was preſented, however, before it was publiſhed.

the verdict was given, Cruden ſaid, " I truſt in God." The Chief Juſtice, Sir William Lee, replied, " I wiſh you had truſted more in God, and not have come hither." Mr. Cruden had recourſe again to his pen, and publiſhed an account of the trial with remarks on the Oeconomy of Private Madhouſes, which he dedicated to the late King.

After this he lived chiefly by correcting the preſs, and under his inſpection ſeveral editions of the Greek and Roman Claſſics were publiſhed with great accuracy. He rendered himſelf uſeful to the bookſellers and printers in various ways. His manners were inoffenſive: he was always to be truſted, and performed his engagements with ſtrict fidelity. In theſe occupations he employed ſeveral years, until the return of his diſorder obliged his friends a third time to ſhut him up in a madhouſe. When he was releaſed, he publiſhed his caſe with the whimſical title of " The Adventures of Alexander the Corrector."—Three parts afterwards appeared under the ſame title. It is not eaſy to characterize them. They are a faithful tranſcript of a wild mind, various, whimſical, ſerious and jocoſe. His madneſs was ſui generis. We find nothing like it in the Annals of Medicine, nor can it be accounted for on any known principles of phyſiology. The faculty are ſeldom called in, and ſeldom attend to caſes like that of Cruden; and the world either laughed at or pitied him: in his worſt paroxyſms it appears that he was perfectly harmleſs, and it is more than probable that the ſeverity of confinement, unneceſſarily added to his diſorder [C].

In September 1753, when laſt releaſed, he undertook what was more difficult to effect than all his former attempts. He endeavoured to perſuade one or two of his friends who had confined him, to ſubmit to be impriſoned in Newgate, as a compenſation for the injuries they had brought upon him. To his ſiſter he propoſed what he thought very mild terms; ſhe was to have her choice of four priſons; Newgate, Reading and Ayleſbury Jails, and the priſon in Windſor Caſtle. When he found that his perſuaſions were of no avail, he commenced an action againſt her and three others, and ſtated his damages at 10,000 l. The cauſe was tried in February, 1754, and a verdict given in favour of the defendants. Cruden had now no remedy but in an appeal to the public: accordingly he publiſhed an account of this trial in a ſix-penny pamphlet, dedicated to the King. He went to St. James's Palace to preſent it, but was prevented, and denied the honour of Knighthood, to which, at this time, he aſpired.

His phrenzy, indeed, was now at its height. He called himſelf " Alexander the Corrector," and gave out that he was commiſſioned by Heaven to reform the manners of the age, particularly to reſtore the due obſervance of the Sabbath. To raiſe the public belief in his favour, he produced and printed certain prophecies of eminent Miniſters and others, all anonymous, or with the initials only of names. The ſubſtance of theſe prophecies was, that " Mr. Cruden was to be a ſecond Joſeph, to be a great man at Court, and to " perform great things for the ſpiritual Iſrael in this ſinful Egypt, &c." Furniſhed with ſuch credentials, he went to Oxford and Cambridge, and exhorted the Ladies and Gentlemen, whom he found in the public walks on the Sabbath, to go home and keep that day holy. But his advice was not welcomed as he wiſhed. And on one occaſion he narrowly eſcaped corporal chaſtiſement for having been too bold in his addreſſes to a young Lady, who happened to be walking with a Student in Clare-Hall walks. He generally followed his advice with a denunciation of eternal wrath in caſe of non-compliance.

On his return to London his ambition increaſed; for ambition he certainly indulged from the idea that he was deſtined to a ſuperior ſtation in life; and the general election approaching, Mr. Cruden determined to ſtand candidate for the city of London, and in a Common Hall was nominated by Mr. Sheriff Chitty, whom he had importuned to do this office for him. What will be thought very remarkable, Mr. Cruden had the ſatisfaction to ſee ſeveral hands held up for him; but he declined the poll which was inſtituted by the other party, and conſequently loſt his election. It is ſcarcely poſſible to record this event with hiſtorical gravity; but it is worthy of notice that he had actually received promiſes of ſupport, and was comforted by the reflection, as he ſays himſelf, that if he had not the hands, he had the hearts of the citizens. His advertiſements on this occaſion are too curious not to be preſerved [D]. They are ſpecimens of his manner of ſpeaking and writing

[C] Unneceſſarily added to his diſorder.] They put a ſtraight waiſtcoat upon him, and beat him, which he relates thus: " When the Corrector went to bed, " the barbarous Inſkip (one of his keepers) bound " him very cloſely in the ſtrait-waſte-coat. This " academical garment is made of ſtrong tick, with " long ſleeves which come below the ends of the " fingers, and the priſoner's arms being claſped upon " his breaſt, and brought round his ſides towards " his back, his hands are tied there very firmly with " ſtrong ſtrings of tape.—The Corrector was very ill " uſed this night: particularly Inſkip ſwore at him " for calling out in his pain, alas! alas! And a " common method with Inſkip and Hare, upon his " calling out through pain, was to give him a blow " or two on the breaſt, and to put a pillow or hand- " kerchief upon his mouth." Uſage like this was certainly not to be juſtified by any part of Mr. Cruden's conduct, and muſt have aggravated his diſtemper.

[D] Not to be preſerved.] " Wedneſday, April 17, " it appeared from what one of the door-keepers of " the palace ſaid to the Corrector, that the letter " ſent by him to the perſonage of the higheſt rank " (aſking the honour of knighthood) came ſafe to hand. " The Corrector, perceiving that he was not likely " to ſucceed at preſent in obtaining the honour of " knighthood; and the election for the Repreſenta- " tives of the City of London in Parliament coming " on the 30th inſtant, it was full time to declare his " rewriting concerning himself, when his phrenzy was at its height. About the same time he paid his addresses to a Lady, but lamented that in this as in every other great design, he could not command success.

Amidst this series of wild attempts and undertakings Mr. Cruden devoted his best hours to study. He was continually making additions to the Concordance, the second edition of which was published in 1761 [E]. At this time he was corrector of the press to the Public Advertiser published by the late Mr. Woodfall. He laboured, indeed, incessantly at some employment or other; and apportioned his time so judiciously that only when he appeared in public could he be said to do nothing. The business of the Printing-Office was rarely over before one o'clock in the morning, when the paper was put to press. Cruden seldom slept more than four or five hours, and before six in the morning

" resolution to offer himself a candidate, though not " yet graced with the order of knighthood. If it " should be asked, why the Corrector was so desirous " of the honour of being a knight; he answers, that " thinking men often seek after titles rather to please " others than themselves.

" Thursday, April 18, the Corrector now suspended " his going to Court, and wrote an appendix to his " Adventures, containing the motives of his being a " candidate for the City of London, and next day " caused copies of it to be dispersed in the coffee-" houses near the Royal Exchange.

" Saturday, April 20, was the first day the Cor- " rector made known his being a candidate in the " News papers. He was this morning at the " Chapter Coffee-house, where some cloudy-headed " Booksellers and Printers dissuaded him from it, " and told him it was now too late: but the Cor- " rector replied, that he was not to look backward " but forward. The appendix was from henceforth " distributed, and when the Corrector himself had " an opportunity of delivering a copy of it to a " Liveryman, he desired the favour of him to read " it, and then to vote as his conscience should direct " him. It was replied by some, that nothing could " be fairer. Several thousands of the appendix were " distributed before and on the day of election.

" Tuesday, April 23, the Corrector, a Citizen and " Liveryman of the Company of Stationers, thought " it proper to acquaint the Sheriffs of his being a " candidate, and therefore sent each of them the " following letter:

" To the honourable Alderman Chitty and Alderman " Blakiston, the two Sheriffs of London.

" Gentlemen,

" I humbly propose myself one of the candidates " to be a Representative for the City of London, at " the ensuing election; which may be looked upon " as an extraordinary step. This is not denied, but " I trust I am under divine direction, and I entirely " refer the issue to the supreme disposer of all things. " I hope that whatever pleaseth God shall please " me, being altogether resigned to his will and " pleasure. It ought to be my care to do my duty, " and then to refer all events to God: It is the " opinion of the Corrector that all the prophecies " concerning him will come to pass in God's own " time and way. The LORD was with JOSEPH, " and that which he did the LORD made it to prosper.

" May the great GOD be pleased powerfully and " graciously to incline the hearts of the Liverymen " to act from the best principles, and to choose those " who will be faithful, and will answer the ends of " so great a trust: and may the persons who shall " be chosen be inclined and determined to act zeal-" ously for the reformation, the peace and prosperity " of the City.

" Heartily wishing you happiness in this world " and in the world to come,

" I am, with great respect,
" Gentlemen,

" Thursday, April 25, the Corrector caused the fol-" lowing letter, addressed to the Liverymen of " London, to be dispersed:

" Gentlemen of the Livery.

" I have acquainted the Sheriffs of my humbly " proposing to be a candidate for one of the Repre- " sentatives in Parliament of the City of London: " which may be looked upon as an extraordinary " step. In the appendix to " Alexander the Corrector's Adventures, I have ac-" quainted you with some of my motives for being a " candidate, which are such as, I hope, will be " approved of by every good man, as they are by " my own conscience.

" If there is any just ground to hope that God " will be pleased to make the Corrector an instrument " to reform the nation, and particularly to promote " the reformation, the peace and prosperity of this " great City, and to bring its inhabitants to a more " religious temper and conduct, no good men in " such an extraordinary case will deny the Corrector " his vote: and the Corrector's election may be a " means to pave the way to his being a JOSEPH, " and an useful prosperous man.

" May GOD be pleased to give a happy turn to " the minds of the electors to act from the best prin-" ciples, and to choose those who will be faithful to " their trust, and study to promote the temporal and " eternal happiness of the people.

" My earnest prayers are put up from time to time " for your happiness in this world, and the world to " come through JESUS CHRIST.

[E] Was published in 1761,] And dedicated to his present Majesty. A short preface informs us, that " as to what respects this NEW EDITION, not-" withstanding the great pains taken in the first, " there was room for improvements. The filling up " of the lines to make the text fuller could not so " well be done in the manuscript copy, as in the " printed. This renders the sentences more com-" pleat in many thousands of places: moreover the " texts are more distinct in many places by the lead-" ing words being distinguished in Italic characters. " Some texts are added, and some improvements " are made in the significations of words, and an " historical account is given of some eminent per-" sons under their proper names; and other things " that need not here be particularly mentioned.

" The labours of many persons to compile Con- " cordances to the Bible, and their acceptance from " time to time by the public, shew their great use-" fulness: It may be reckoned a good sign that re-" ligion is revived in some considerable degree in the " present age, by the great demand for Concordances " and religious books. The first edition of several " thousands in number has been long sold off, which " shews this book's favourable reception from the " public; and a demand has long been made for a " new edition." he might always be found turning over his Bible, adding, amending, and improving his Concordance with great and ſcrupulous attention: at this he continued till evening, when he went to the Printing Office. This aſſiduous attention to uſeful objects, it was hoped, would reſtore his mind to a ſtate of calm regularity, and in ſome degree this was the caſe. His next appearance in public will be ſeen with ſatisfaction.

In 1762, one Richard Potter, a Sailor, was tried and capitally condemned at the Old Bailey for forging, or rather uttering, knowing it to be forged, a Seaman's Will, a crime which then, as well as now, is rarely pardoned. It appeared, however, from the evidence, that Potter was a poor illiterate creature, the tool of another, and ignorant of the nature of the crime he committed. Fortunately for him Mr. Cruden happened to be in Court, and was ſo firmly convinced that Potter was a proper object of the Royal clemency, that he determined to interfere in his behalf.—To be more fully ſatisfied, however, he viſited Potter in Newgate, examined him, and found that his crime was the crime of ignorance, without any evil intention on his part. But it was not to ſave him from the ſentence of the law only that Cruden meditated. He prayed with him, exhorted him, taught him the principles of religion, and gave him a proper ſenſe of the wickedneſs of his paſt life, and the enormity of the crime for which he was condemned: in a word, he made a convert of a poor wretch who had ſcarcely ever heard of a God. He then began to deviſe means to obtain a pardon, and improbable as it appeared, his repeated applications ſucceeded, and Potter's ſentence was changed into tranſportation. Mr. Cruden accompanied his petition to the Earl of Hallifax, then Secretary of State, with a copy of the ſecond edition of the Concordance, to which was prefixed an elegant Latin Dedication to his Lordſhip [F]. The tenderneſs with which Mr. Cruden viſited, exhorted, fed and cloathed his pupil, the anxiety he felt, and the unceaſing importunity of his applications to every perſon that could be uſeful to Potter, deſerve to be remembered with approbation, and to reconcile us to all his oddities. A particular account of the whole affair was publiſhed the ſame year, entitled "The Hiſtory of Richard Potter, &c. &c."

The ſucceſs Mr. Cruden had enjoyed in reforming this poor criminal induced him to continue his labours among the other felons in Newgate. He viſited them every day, gave them New Teſtaments, Catechiſms, &c. catechiſed them, and beſtowed ſmall pecuniary rewards on the moſt apt ſcholars. His labour, however, was loſt; the books were ſoon exchanged for money, and the money ſpent in drinking; and Cruden diſcontinued his practice when he found it produced no better effects. A regard for the eternal welfare of his fellow-creatures was a predominant feature in his character. He was peculiarly elated when he had ſucceeded in reſcuing any poor creature from the barbarity of ignorance or the practice of wickedneſs. Of this we have another inſtance, but at what period it happened cannot now be remembered. Returning one Sunday evening from a place of worſhip, he accidentally met with a man whoſe looks betrayed anxious ſorrow, melancholy, and, as Cruden imagined, deſpair. He immediately accoſted the man, and drew from him a confeſſion that the extreme poverty of his family, and other cauſes, had driven him to the deſperate reſolution of committing ſuicide. Mr. Cruden expoſtulated with him, diſplayed the wickedneſs of his intention, and adminiſtered ſuch friendly conſolation, accompanied with pecuniary aſſiſtance and a promiſe of future ſupport, that the poor man became chearful, reſigned and hopeful. In ſuch acts Mr. Cruden delighted.

At the time when the diſputes between Mr. Wilkes and the Government agitated the nation, Mr. Cruden wrote a ſmall pamphlet againſt that Gentleman, whom he never could hear named with patience. He teſtified his averſion to him in a way peculiar to himſelf, by effacing No. 45, wherever he found it chalked on doors or window-ſhutters. His inſtrument was a large piece of ſponge, which he carried in his pocket, partly for this purpoſe, and partly that no words, offenſive to good morals, might be allowed to diſgrace the walls, doors, &c. of the metropolis. This employment rendered his walks through the city very tedious.

In the year 1769 he viſited Aberdeen, the place of his nativity, and in a public hall gave a lecture on the cauſe of reformation; contended that he was born to reform the age, and exhorted all ranks to amend their ways. There was nothing in this advice improper or abſurd—but Mr. Cruden's manner was always at variance with his matter, and he met with no better ſucceſs here than in other places. Many anecdotes are related of his labours here. Among others, he printed the Fourth Commandment in the form of a hand-bill, and diſtributed them to all perſons, without diſtinction, whom he met in the ſtreets on Sunday. To a young Clergyman whom Cruden thought too conceited and modern, he very gravely and formally preſented a little catechiſm, uſed by children in Scotland, called "The Mother's Catechiſm," dedicated to the Young and Ignorant. For young people he always had his pockets full of religious tracts, ſuch as Guyſe's Sermons, &c. which he beſtowed with pleaſure on ſuch as promiſed to read them.

After reſiding about a year at Aberdeen he returned to London, and took lodgings in Camden-ſtreet, Iſlington, where he died. In the morning of Thurſday, November 1, 1770, he was found dead on his knees, apparently in the poſture of prayer. He had complained for ſome days of an aſthmatic affection, but it did not ſeem attended with danger. As he never married, he bequeathed his moderate ſavings to his relations, except a certain ſum to the city of Aberdeen to be employed in the purchaſe of religious books for the uſe of the poor; and he founded a burſary (or exhibition) of five pounds ſterling per annum, to aſſiſt in educating a Student at the Mariſchall College. This burſary was to be obtained on certain terms ſpecified in his will, one of which was a perfect acquaintance with Vincent's Catechiſm.

In private life Mr. Cruden was courteous and affable; prone to give his opinions, and firm in all his religious perſuaſions. To the poor he was as liberal of his money as of his advice: he ſeldom, indeed, ſeparated the one from the other. His concern for them muſt have been ſincere, for intereſt he could have none; and his generoſity muſt have been pure, for he often gave more than he retained for his own uſes. To ſuch young men, eſpecially from Aberdeen, as were recommended to him, he acted like a father, or affectionate friend and tutor. Among men of genius he cannot be claſſed: but in his greateſt labours he experienced no fatigue, and the utility of his literary projects will not admit of a diſpute. His Concordance was his favourite work [G]; and it is probable that the attention he beſtowed upon it was favourable to the ſtate of his mind, although it could not altogether prevent the return of that phrenzy which gave a certain colour to all his actions, and ſuggeſted to him thoſe whimſical plans of reformation, and thoſe hopes of ſuperiority, which were as uſeleſs to himſelf as unprofitable to others. In converſation and in writing his ſtile was ſtiff and aukward. He does not appear to have had a prompt memory, and his words came ſlowly. In religion he profeſſed Calviniſm, as appears from the definitions in his Concordance of the words grace, faith, predeſtination, &c. But it muſt be added, that he had not an intolerant ſpirit, and often with ſeverity he cenſured the principles and practices of narrow-minded men. During the greateſt part of his life in London, he joined in communion with Dr. Guyſe's Independent Meeting; but about the year 1761-2, when age and infirmities obliged the Doctor to reſign, and Dr. Stafford ſucceeded him, Mr. Cruden attended Dr. Conder on the paved ſtones, Moorfields, and went to Dr. Guyſe's Meeting on the firſt Sunday of every month only, when the Sacrament was adminiſtered.]

[G] His Concordance was his favourite work.] The laſt edition of this work was the fourth, publiſhed in 1786. The two former editions as well as this are embelliſhed with a head of the author. That publiſhed in 1769 is the moſt ſtriking likeneſs.

DANIEL

D.

DANIEL (Samuel), an eminent Poet and Hiſtorian [A], in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James I. was the ſon of a Muſic-maſter, and born near Taunton in Somerſetſhire (a), in the year 1562. In 1579 (b), he was admitted a Commoner of Magdalen-Hall in Oxford; where he continued about three years, and, by the help of an excellent Tutor, made a conſiderable improvement in academical

[A] An eminent Poet and Hiſtorian.] Mr. Daniel's Poetical Works, conſiſting of Dramatic and other Pieces, are as follows. I. The Complaint of Roſamond. London, 1594. 1598, 1611, and 1623, in 4to. II. A Letter from Octavia to Marcus Antonius. London, 1611, in 8vo. (1). Theſe two pieces reſemble each other both in the ſubject and ſtile, being written in the Ovidian manner, with great tenderneſs and variety of paſſions. The meaſure is ſtanzas of ſeven lines, of which take the following ſpecimen, where he makes Roſamond ſpeak of Beauty in as expreſſive a manner as deſcription can reach.

Ah! Beauty, Syren, fair enchanting good,
Sweet ſilent rhet'rick of perſuading eyes;
Dumb eloquence, whoſe pow'r doth move the blood,
More than the words or wiſdom of the wiſe;
Still harmony, whoſe diapaſon lies
Within a brow; the key, which paſſions move,
To raviſh ſenſe, and play a world in love (2).

III. Hymen's Triumph: A Paſtoral Tragi-Comedy. Preſented at the Queen's Court in the Strand, at her Majeſty's magnificent entertainment of the King's moſt excellent Majeſty, being at the nuptials of the Lord Roxborough. London, 1623, 4to. ſecond edition (3). It is dedicated by a copy of verſes To the moſt excellent Majeſty of the higheſt born Princeſs, Anne of Denmark, Queen of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland. It is introduced by a pretty contrived Prologue, by way of dialogue, in which Hymen is oppoſed by Avarice, Envy, and Jealouſy, the diſturbers of quiet marriage. In this piece, our author ſometimes touches the paſſions with a very delicate hand. IV. The Queen's Arcadia: A Paſtoral Tragi-Comedy. Preſented to her Majeſty and her Ladies, by the Univerſity of Oxford, in Auguſt, 1605. London, 1623, 4to. (4). It is dedicated by a copy of verſes To the Queen's moſt excellent Majeſty. V. The Viſion of the Twelve Goddeſſes, preſented in a Maſk, the eighth of January, at Hampton-Court, by the Queen's moſt excellent Majeſty and her Ladies. London, 1604, 8vo. and 1623, 4to. Some copies have it, The Wiſdom of the Twelve Goddeſſes, &c. (5). It is dedicated to the Right Honourable the Lady Lucy, Counteſs of Bedford. It had been printed without the author's leave, and ſo imperfectly, that, to prevent the prejudice it might ſuffer thereby, he publiſhed it from his own copy. His deſign, under the ſhapes, and in the perſons of twelve goddeſſes, was, to ſhadow out the bleſſings, which the nation enjoyed under the peaceful reign of King James I. By Juno was repreſented Power; by Pallas, Wiſdom and Defence; by Venus, Love and Amity; by Veſta, Religion; by Diana, Chaſtity; by Proſerpine, Riches; by Macaria, Felicity; by Concordia, the Union of Hearts; by Aſtræa, Juſtice; by Flora, the Beauties of the Earth; by Ceres, Plenty; and by Tethys, Naval Power. All theſe allegorical perſonages were properly attired, and offered up the ſeveral emblems of their power to the temple of Peace, erected upon four pillars, repreſenting the four Virtues, that ſupported a globe of the earth. 1. Juno, in a ſky-coloured mantle, embroidered with gold, and figured with peacocks feathers, wearing a crown of gold on her head, preſents a ſceptre. 2. Pallas (which was the perſon her Majeſty choſe to repreſent) was attired in a blue mantle, with a ſilver embroidery of all weapons and engines of war, with an helmet on her head; and preſents a launce and target. 3. Venus, in a mantle of dove-colour, and ſilver embroidered doves, preſented (inſtead of her Ceſtus, the Girdle of Amity) a ſcarf of divers colours. 4. Veſta, in a white mantle embroidered with gold flames, and dreſſed like a Nun, preſented a burning lamp in one hand, and a book in the other. 5. Diana, in a green mantle embroidered with ſilver half-moons, and a creſcent of pearl on her head, preſents a bow and a quiver. 6. Proſerpine, in a black mantle embroidered with gold flames, with a crown of gold on her head, preſents a mine of gold ore. 7. Macaria, the Goddeſs of Felicity, in a mantle of purple and ſilver, embroidered with the figures of Plenty and Wiſdom (which concur to the making of true happineſs) preſents a Caduceus with the figure of Abundance. 8. Concordia, in a party-coloured mantle of crimſon and white (the colours of England and Scotland joined) embroidered with ſilver hands in hand, with a head-dreſs likewiſe of party-coloured roſes, preſents a branch thereof in a wreath or knot. 9. Aſtræa, in a mantle of crimſon embroidered with ſilver, figuring the ſword and balance (the emblems of Juſtice) which ſhe preſented. 10. Flora, in a mantle of divers colours, embroidered with all ſorts of flowers, preſents a pot of flowers. 11. Ceres, in a ſtraw-colour and ſilver embroidery, with ears of corn, and a head-dreſs of the ſame, preſents a ſickle. 12. Tethys, in a ſea-green mantle, with a ſilver embroidery of waves, and a head-dreſs of reeds, preſents a trident (6). VI. The Tragedy of Cleopatra. Lond. 1594 and 1598, 4to (7). It is dedicated by a copy of verſes To the Right Honourable the Lady Mary, Counteſs of Pembroke. VII. The Tragedy of Philotas. London, 1611, &c. 8vo. (8). It is dedicated by a copy of verſes To the Prince, afterwards King Charles I. This play met with ſome enemies, not on the ſcore of the wit, or conduct of the deſign; demical learning. But his genius inclining him more to ſtudies of a ſofter and gayer nature, he left the Univerſity without a degree, and applied himſelf to Engliſh Hiſtory and ſign; but becauſe it was reported, that the character of Philotas was drawn for the unfortunate Earl of Eſſex; which obliged the author to vindicate himſelf from this charge in an Apology, printed at the end of the play. Both this play, and that of Cleopatra, are written after the manner of the antients, with a chorus between each act; and were much eſteemed in their time. VIII. The Hiſtory of the Civil Wars between the Houſes of York and Lancaſter. A Poem in eight books. London, 1604, 8vo. and 1623, 4to. with his picture before it (9). It is dedicated To the High and moſt Illuſtrious Prince Charles His Excellence. The introduction to this Poem is plainly an imitation of the beginning of Lucan's Pharſalia.

I ſing the Civil Wars, tumultuous broils,
And bloody factions of a mighty land;
Whoſe people, haughty, proud with foreign ſpoils,
Upon themſelves turn back their conqu'ring hand;
Whilſt kin their kin, brother the brother foils;
Like enſigns all againſt like enſigns band;
Bows againſt bows, the crown againſt the crown;
Whilſt all pretending right, all right's thrown down.

What fury, O! what madneſs held thee ſo,
Dear England, too, too prodigal of blood,
To waſte ſo much, and war without a foe;
Whilſt France, to ſee thy ſpoils, at pleaſure ſtood!
How much might'ſt thou have purchas'd with leſs woe,
T' have done thee honour, and thy people good?
Thine might have been whatever lies between
The Alps and us, the Pyrenees and Rhene (10).

The pithy Daniel, whoſe ſalt lines afford
A weighty ſentence in each little word.

Another author, in a copy called A Cenſure of the Poets (18), ſpeaks of him thus:

(18) See Sportive Wit, 8vo. p. 70.

Amongſt theſe Samuel Daniel, whom I
May ſpeak of, but to cenſure do deny:
Only have heard ſome wiſe men him rehearſe
To be too much Hiſtorian in verſe.
His rhimes were ſmooth, his metres well did cloſe;
But yet his manner better fitted proſe.

His good friend Mr. Charles Fitz-Geoffry wrote the following Latin epigram in his praiſe (19):

(19) Vide Epigr. in 8vo. Oxon. 1601.

Spenſerum ſi quis noſtrum velit eſſe Maronem,
Tu, Daniele, mihi Naſo Britannus eris.
Sin illum potius Phœbum velit eſſe Britannum,
Tum, Daniele, mihi tu Maro noſter eris.
Nil Phœbo ulterius; ſi quid foret, illud haberet Spenſerus, Phœbus tu, Daniele, fores.
Quippe loqui Phœbus cuperet ſi more Britanno,
Haud ſcio quo poterat, ni velit ore ſuo.

If Spenſer merits Roman Virgil's name,
Daniel, at leaſt, comes in for Ovid's fame.
If Spenſer rather claims Apollo's wit,
Virgil's illuſtrious name will Daniel fit.
No higher than Apollo we can go:
But, if a loftier title you can ſhow,
That greater name let Spenſer's Muſe command,
And Daniel be the Phœbus of our land.
For, in my judgment, if the god of verſe
In Engliſh wou'd heroic deeds rehearſe,
No language ſo expreſſive he cou'd chuſe,
As that of Engliſh Daniel's lofty Muſe.

We come now to conſider Mr. Daniel as an Hiſtorian, in which capacity he wrote: The Firſt Part of the Hiſtory of England, in three Books. London, 1613. 4to. reaching to the end of King Stephen. To which he afterwards added a Second Part, reaching to the end of King Edward III. London, 1618, 1621, 1623, and 1634. This Hiſtory was continued to the end of King Richard III. by John Truſſel, a Trader and Alderman of the city of Wincheſter (20). Of Mr. Daniel's Hiſtory a certain writer (21) gives this character: 'It is written with great brevity and 'politeneſs; and his political and moral Reflections 'are very fine, uſeful, and inſtructive.' Mr. Langbaine takes it to be the Crown of all our author's Works (22); and Dr. Fuller tells us (23), 'he was a 'judicious Hiſtorian; witneſs his Lives of our Eng-'liſh Kings, ſince the conqueſt, until King Edward 'the Third; wherein he hath the happineſs to re-'concile brevity with clearneſs, qualities of great 'diſtance in other authors.' Dr. Heylin (24), ſpeaking of the chief Hiſtorians of this nation, has theſe words: And, to end the bead-roll, Half the ſtory of this realm done by Mr. Daniel, of which I believe that which himſelf ſaith of it in his Epiſtle to the reader, that there was never brought together more of the main. To conclude the character of this performance, I ſhall tranſcribe what Dr. Kennet ſays of it (25). 'Mr. Daniel's Hiſtory follows next, containing the 'reigns of William I. and II. Henry I. King Stephen, 'Henry II. Richard I. King John, Henry III. Ed-'ward I. II. and III. The author had a place at 'Court in the reign of King James I. and ſeems to 'have taken all the refinement a Court could give 'him. It is ſaid, he had a good vein in Poetry, 'and it is certain he has ſhewn great judgment in 'keeping it, as he did, from infecting his proſe, 'and deſtroying that ſimplicity, which is a principal 'beauty in the ſtile of an Hiſtorian. His narration 'is ſmooth and clear, and carries every-where an 'air of good ſenſe and juſt eloquence; and his Eng-'liſh is much more modern than Milton's, though 'he lived before him. But Mr. Milton choſe to write (if

[B] —— under the encouragement and patronage of the Earl of Pembroke's family.] This may be gathered from a hint in his Defence of Rhime, dedicated to William Herbert Earl of Pembroke. For, addreſſing himſelf to that Lord, he ſays (26): ' We are told, ' how that our meaſures go wrong, all rhiming is ' groſs, vulgar, barbarous; which if it be ſo, we ' have loſt much labour to no purpoſe; and for my ' own particular, I cannot but blame the fortune of ' the times, and my own genius, that caſt me upon ' ſo wrong a courſe, drawn with the current of cuſ- ' tom, and an unexamined example: Having been ' firſt encouraged and framed thereunto by your moſt ' worthy and honourable Mother, and received the ' firſt notion for the formal ordering of thoſe com- ' poſitions at Wilton, which I muſt ever acknowledge ' to have been my beſt ſchool, and thereof always ' am to hold a feeling and grateful memory. By the way it muſt be noted, that this Lady Anne, afterwards Counteſs of Pembroke, was the ſame perſon, who lived like a Princeſs, for many years after our author's death, in Weſtmorland; was a great lover and encourager of learning and learned men, hoſpitable, charitable to the poor, and of a moſt generous and public ſpirit. She died the 22d of March, 1675, aged 87, and was buried under a ſtately monument in the church of Appleby, in Weſtmorland (28).

 [The writers of the Biographia Dramatica have remarked, that there is an evident confuſion in the account which ſome authors have given of Mr. Daniel's Life. But the confuſion is ſolely owing to a blunder of Langbaine's that is flagrantly abſurd. Langbaine, after ſtating the time of Mr. Daniel's birth and death in the ſame manner as is done in the article above, unaccountably adds, that he lived to fourſcore years of age. This groſs miſtake has been copied by Gildon and Jacob (30).

(30) Biographia Dramatica, vol. i. p. 110.

Mr. Granger obſerves, on Samuel Daniel's having ſucceeded Spenſer as Poet-Laureat to Queen Elizabeth, that he was then thought to have merited the Laurel. " His proſe," adds Mr. Granger, " has much more ſimplicity and elegance than is to " be found in the generality of the writers of his " age; but his poetry is too proſaic to gain many " admirers in the preſent (31)." It appears, from the lines quoted in note [A], that the ſame objection was made to him by ſome of his contemporaries.

(31) Biographical Hiſtory of England, vol. ii. p. 11, 12. 2d edit.

Mr. Headley, in the Biographical Sketches prefixed to his " Select Beauties of ancient Engliſh Poetry," has given the moſt accurate eſtimate that has yet been formed of Daniel's poetical character. Speaking of the dialogue between Ulyſſes and the Syren, in one of our author's plays, and which he acknowledges to be only neat and unaffected, he adds:

" But Daniel has a right to the merit of ſtill higher excellence. Though very rarely ſublime, he has ſkill in the pathetic, and his pages are diſgraced with neither pedantry nor conceit. We find, both in his poetry and proſe, ſuch a legitimate and rational flow of language as approaches nearer the ſtyle of the 18th than the 16th century, and of which we may ſafely aſſert, that it will never become obſolete. He certainly was the Atticus of his day. It ſeems to have been his error to have entertained too great a diffidence of his own abilities. Conſtantly contented with the ſedate propriety of good ſenſe, which he no ſooner attains than he ſeems to reſt ſatisfied, though his reſources, had he but made the effort, would have carried him much farther. In thus eſcaping cenſure, he is not always entitled to praiſe. From not endeavouring to be great, he ſometimes miſſes of being reſpectable. The conſtitution of his mind ſeems often to have failed him in the ſultry and exhauſting regions of the Muſes; for, though generally neat, eaſy, and perſpicuous, he too frequently grows ſlack, languid, and enervated. In peruſing his long hiſtorical poem we grow ſleepy at the dead ebb of his narrative, notwithſtanding being occaſionally relieved with ſome touches of the pathetic. Unfortunate in the choice of his ſubject, he ſeems fearful of ſupplying its defects by digreſſional embelliſhment. Inſtead of fixing upon one of a more fanciful caſt, which the natural coolneſs of his judgement would neceſſarily have corrected, he has cooped himſelf up within the limited and narrow pale of dry events: inſtead of caſting his eye on the general hiſtory of human nature, and giving his genius a range over her immeaſurable fields, he has confined himſelf to an abſtract diary of Fortune: inſtead of preſenting us with pictures of Truth from the effects of the Paſſions, he has verſified the truth of action only. He has ſufficiently, therefore, ſhewn the hiſtorian, but by no means the poet. For, to uſe a ſentiment of Sir Wm. Davenant's, " Truth narrative and paſt is the idol of hiſtorians (who worſhip a dead thing,) and truth operative, and by its effects continually alive, is the miſtreſs of poets, who hath not her exiſtence in matter but in reaſon." Daniel has often the ſoftneſs of Rowe without his effeminacy. In his Complaint of Cleopatra he has caught Ovid's manner very happily, as he has no obſcurities either of ſtyle or language, neither pedantry nor affectation, all of which have concurred in baniſhing from uſe the works of his contemporaries. The oblivion he has met with is peculiarly undeſerved: he has ſhared their fate, though innocent of their faults. Daniel enjoyed the friendſhip and the praiſes of the moſt eminent men of his age (32)."

We ſhall inſert one of the ſpecimens which Mr. Headley, in his collection, has produced of Daniel's poetical talents. It is the deſcription of Richard the Second, the morning before his murder in Pomfret Caſtle.

" Whether

Whether the ſoul receives intelligence
By her near Genius, of the body's end,
And ſo imparts a ſadneſs to the ſenſe,
Foregoing ruin, whereto it doth tend;
Or whether Nature elſe hath conference
With profound ſleep, and ſo doth warning ſend
By prophetizing dreams, what hurt is near,
And gives the heavy careful heart to fear:

" However, ſo it is; the now ſad King
(Toſs'd here and there, his quiet to confound)
Feels a ſtrange weight of ſorrows gathering
Upon his trembling heart, and ſees no ground;
Feels ſudden terror bring cold ſhivering:
Liſts not to eat; ſtill muſes; ſleeps unſound:
His ſenſes droop, his ſteady eyes unquick;
And much he ails, and yet he is not ſick.

" The morning of that day which was his laſt,
After a weary reſt riſing to pain,
Out at a little grate his eyes he caſt
Upon thoſe bord'ring hills, and open plain,
And views the Town, and ſees how people paſs'd;
Where others liberty makes him complain
The more his own, and grieves his ſoul the more;
Conferring captive crowns, with freedom poor.

" O happy Man, ſaith he, that lo I ſee
Grazing his cattle in thoſe pleaſant fields!
If he but knew his good, (how bleſſed he
That feels not what affliction greatneſs yields!)
Other than what he is he would not be,
Nor change his ſtate with him that ſceptres wields.
Thine, thine is that true Life—that is to live,
To reſt ſecure, and not riſe up to grieve.

" Thou ſitt'ſt at home ſafe by thy quiet fire,
And hear'ſt of others harms, but feeleſt none;
And there thou tell'ſt of Kings, and who aſpire,
Who fall, who riſe, who triumph, who do moan.
Perhaps thou talk'ſt of me, and doſt enquire
Of my reſtraint, why here I live alone;
And pitieſt this my miſerable fall:
For pity muſt have part: envy not all.

" Thrice happy you, that look as from the ſhore,
And have no venture in the wreck you ſee;
No int'reſt, no occaſion to deplore
Other mens travels, while yourſelves ſit free.
How much doth your ſweet reſt make us the more
To ſee our miſery, and what we be!
Whoſe blinded greatneſs ever in turmoil,
Still ſeeking happy life, makes life a toil.

" Great Diocleſian (and more great therefore,
For yielding up that whereto Pride aſpires)
Reck'ning thy gardens in Illyria more
Than all the Empire, all what th' Earth admires;
Thou well didſt teach, that he is never poor
That little hath, but he that much deſires;
Finding more true delight in that ſmall ground,
Than in poſſeſſing all the Earth was found.

Are Kings (that freedom give) themſelves not free,
As meaner men, to take what they may give?
What! are they of ſo fatal a degree,
That they cannot deſcend from that, and live?
Unleſs they ſtill be Kings, can they not be?
Nor may they their authority ſurvive?
Will not my yielded crown redeem my breath?
Still am I fear'd?—is there no way but death (33)?" (33) Ibid. 111—113.

With regard to Daniel's dramatic pieces, it is obſerved, in the Biographia Dramatica, that they are not equal to ſome other of his poetical works, and ſtill leſs ſo to his hiſtories, which are yet held in very high eſtimation. His tragedy, however, of Cleopatra was greatly eſteemed in its time; and there is an edition of it in 1623, in which the author has made various alterations, much to its advantage. Both in this Tragedy and in his Philotas, Mr. Daniel has ſhewn great judgment, by treading in the ſteps of the ancients in the modelizing of his fable, and the conduct of his morals; two circumſtances of principal importance, though frequently diſregarded (34).

DANVERS (HENRY), a brave warrior in the end of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventeenth century; and created Earl of Danby by King Charles I. was the ſecond ſon of Sir John Danvers, Knight [A], by Elizabeth his wife, daughter and coheir to John Nevil the laſt Lord Latimer (a). He was born at Danteſey in Wiltſhire, on the 28th day of June, 1573. After an education ſuitable to his birth, he went and ſerved in the Low-Country wars, under Maurice Count of Naſſau, afterwards Prince of Orange; and was engaged in many military actions of thoſe times, both by ſea and land. He was made a Captain in the wars of France, occaſioned in that kingdom by the League; and there knighted for his good ſervice under Henry IV. King of France. Next, he was employed in Ireland (b), as Lieutenant-General of the Horſe, and Serjeant-Major of the whole Army, under Robert Earl of Eſſex, and Charles Baron of Montjoy, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (c). Upon the acceſſion of King James I. he was, on account of his family's deſerts and ſufferings [B], advanced, the twenty-firſt of July, 1603, to the dignity of a Peer of this realm, by the title of Baron of Danteſey (d): and in 1605, by a ſpecial act of Parliament, reſtored in blood, as heir to his father, notwithſtanding the attainder of his elder brother, Sir Charles Danvers, Knight (e). Moreover, he was appointed Lord Preſident of Munſter in Ireland (f): and in 1620 made Governor of the Iſle of Guerneſy, for life (g). By King Charles I. he was created Earl of Danby (h), on February 5, 1625-6; and made of his Privy-Council; and Knight of the Order of the Garter (i). [A] Was the ſecond ſon of Sir John Danvers, Knt.] That family was originally of Anvers or Antuerp, as their ſurname implies. The greateſt acceſſion to their honour and fortune (1), came by the marriage of Sir John Danvers with Elizabeth, the youngeſt daughter, and one of the co-heireſſes to John Lord Latimer: Whoſe three other daughters, were, Catherine, wife of Henry Earl of Northumberland; Dorothy, wife of Tho. Cecill, the firſt Earl of Exeter; and Lucy, wife of Sir William Cornwallis, Knt. (2). Sir Henry Danvers's elder brother, was Sir Charles Danvers, Knt. who adhering to Robert Earl of Eſſex, in his diſloyal deſigns againſt the Court, fell a ſacrifice to the Cecilian faction, and was attainted of high-treaſon, and beheaded in 1601 (3). The reader is to obſerve, that this family's ſurname is ſometimes written Danvers, and ſometimes Davers (4).

His right and title to that piece of land, he conveyed to the Univerſity, on the 27th of March, 1622. And the ground being firſt conſiderably raiſed, to prevent its being overflowed by the river Charwell; the Heads of the Univerſity laid the firſt ſtones of the walls, on the 25th of July following. They were finiſhed in 1633, being fourteen foot high: and coſt the noble benefactor about five thouſand pounds. Maſter of Sidney-College, Camb. and Archdeacon of Taunton. [But the air not agreeing with Dr. Hall, he obtained leave to return to England about Chriſtmas, and Thomas Goade, D. D. was ſent in his room (3).] They embarked Octob. 17 (4), landed at Middleburgh the 20th; came to the Hague the 27th of the ſame month; and thence removed to Dort, where the Synod was opened November 3, O. S. and ended April 29 (5). They came back to England May 7 (6). During their ſtay in Holland, theſe four Divines had ten pounds a day allowed them by the States; and a preſent of two hundred pounds, at their departure, for their charges; beſides a golden medal, to each of them, whereon was repreſented the Synod ſitting (7).

[D] For meddling (in a Sermon preached before the King at Whitehall) with the Predeſtinarian controverſy.] As ſoon as his Sermon was ended, it was ſignified to him, That his Majeſty was much diſpleaſed, that he had ſtirred this queſtion, which his Majeſty had forbidden to be meddled withal, one way or other: the Biſhop's anſwer was, That he had delivered nothing, but the received doctrine of our Church, eſtabliſhed in the 17th Article, and that he was ready to juſtify the truth of what he had then taught. He was told, The doctrine was not gainſaid, but his Majeſty had given command, theſe queſtions ſhould not be debated, and therefore he took it more offenſively that any ſhould be ſo bold, as in his own hearing to break his royal commands. To this he replied, That he never underſtood his Majeſty had forbidden the handling of any doctrine compriſed in the Articles of our Church, but only raiſing of new queſtions, or adding of new ſenſe thereunto, which he had not done, nor ever ſhould do. Two days after, when he appeared before the Privy-Council, Dr. Sam. Harſnet, Archbiſhop of York, made a ſpeech nearly half an hour long, aggravating the boldneſs of Biſhop Davenant's offence, and ſhewing many inconveniencies that it was likely to draw after it. When the Archbiſhop had finiſhed his ſpeech, the Biſhop deſired, That ſince he was called thither as an offender, he might not be put to anſwer a long ſpeech upon the ſudden, but that his Grace would be pleaſed to charge him point by point, and ſo to receive his anſwer; for he did not yet underſtand wherein he had broken any commandment of his Majeſty's, which was taken for granted. After ſome pauſe, the Archbiſhop told him, He knew well enough the point which was urged againſt him, namely the breach of the King's declaration. Then he ſtood upon this defence, That the doctrine of Predeſtination which he taught, was not forbidden by the Declaration: 1ſt. Becauſe in the Declaration all the Articles are eſtabliſhed, amongſt which, the Article of Predeſtination is one. 2. Becauſe all Miniſters are urged to ſubſcribe unto the truth of the Article, and all ſubjects to continue in the profeſſion of that as well as of the reſt. Upon theſe and ſuch like grounds, he gathered, that it could not be eſteemed amongſt forbidden, curious, or needleſs doctrines; and here he deſired that out of any clauſe in the Declaration it might be ſhewed him, that keeping himſelf within the bounds of the Article, he had tranſgreſſed his Majeſty's command; but the Declaration was not produced, nor any particular words in it: only this was urged, That the King's will was, that for the peace of the Church theſe high queſtions ſhould be forborne. He added, That he was ſorry he underſtood not his Majeſty's intention; which if he had done before, he ſhould have made choice of ſome other matter to treat of, which might have given no offence; and that for the time to come, he ſhould conform himſelf as readily as any other to his Majeſty's command; whereupon he was diſmiſſed. At his departure, he entreated the Lords of the Council, to let his Majeſty underſtand, that he had not boldly, or wilfully and wittingly, againſt his Declaration, meddled with the forenamed point; and that now underſtanding fully his Majeſty's mind, and intention, he ſhould humbly yield obedience thereunto (8).

[E] And even admitted to kiſs the King's hand.] When he came into the royal preſence, his Majeſty declared to him his reſolution, That he would not have this high point meddled withal or debated, either the one way or the other, becauſe it was too high for the people's underſtanding; and other points which concern reformation and newneſs of life, were more needful and profitable. The Biſhop promiſed obedience therein, and ſo kiſſing his Majeſty's hand departed (9).

of the ſorrowful times, that he ſaw were bad, and foreſaw would be worſe, did not a little contribute (q). Among other benefactions, he gave to Queen's College in Cambridge, the perpetual Advowſons of the Rectories of Cheverel Magna, and Newton Tony in Wiltſhire; and a Rent-charge of thirty-one pounds ten ſhillings per annum, for the founding of two Bible-Clerks, and buying books for the library, in the ſame College (r). We ſhall give an account of what he publiſhed in the note [F]. As to his character; He was humble, and hoſpitable; painful in preaching and writing; and behaved in every ſtation with exemplary gravity and moderation (s). He was a man of great learning, and an eminent Divine (t); but ſtrictly attached to Calviniſm, with all its abſurdities of unconditionate Predeſtination, &c. Whilſt he was at the Synod of Dort, he inclined to the doctrine of Univerſal Redemption; and was for a middle way between the two extremes, maintaining The Certainty of the Salvation of a certain number of the Elect; and that offers of pardon were ſent not only to all that ſhould believe and repent, but to all that heard the Goſpel: that Grace ſufficient to convince and perſuade the impenitent (ſo as to lay the blame of their condemnation upon themſelves) went along with theſe offers; that the Redemption of Chriſt and his Merits were applicable to theſe; and conſequently there was a poſſibility of their Salvation (u). He was buried in Saliſbury Cathedral.

D'AVENANT or DAVENANT (WILLIAM), Poet-Laureat in the reigns of Charles the Firſt and Charles the Second. He was the younger ſon of an honeſt citizen of Oxford, one Mr. John Davenant, who kept that which was afterwards the Crown-Tavern there, and was a perſon of a very grave diſpoſition, as well as unblemiſhed reputation (a). William Davenant, of whom we are to ſpeak, was born in the latter end of the month of February 1605, and, on the third of March following, was chriſtened at St. Martin's Church, in which pariſh his father's houſe ſtood (b). While he was a child he was very much taken notice of for his briſk and lively parts, and for his early inclination to letters, more eſpecially to Poetry, hinted by ſome, and aſſerted by others, to have been owing to ſome very ſingular accidents, as to which it may not be amiſs to enter into a few particulars, though the reports themſelves deſerve but little credit (c) [A]. He received the firſt rudiments of polite learning from Mr. Edward Sylveſter, who kept,

(b) Langbaine's EngliſhDramatic Poets, p. 106.

(c) Winſtanley's Lives of Engliſh Poets, p. 185.

[A] Deſerve but little credit.] We are obliged to Mr. Wood for a double account of this celebrated Poet. In his Latin work, which was tranſlated for him, and is thought ſometimes to expreſs the ſentiments alſo of Dr. Fell, under whoſe auſpice that tranſlation was performed; there is a ſuccinct account of the different humours of John Davenant the father, and William Davenant the ſon (1). But in Mr. Wood's Engliſh Hiſtory of Oxford writers, we have his ſentiments a little more at large; for, having told us who his father was, and that the tavern he kept was afterwards known by the ſign of the Crown, he proceeds thus (2): 'His mother was a 'very beautiful woman, of a good wit and converſation, in which ſhe was imitated by none of her 'children, but by this William. The father, who 'was a very grave and diſcreet citizen (yet an 'admirer and lover of plays and play-makers, eſpecially Shakeſpeare, who frequented his houſe in 'his journies between Warwickſhire and London) 'was of a melancholic diſpoſition, and was ſeldom 'or never ſeen to laugh, in which he was imitated 'by none of his children, but by Robert his eldeſt 'ſon, afterwards Fellow of St. John's college, and 'a venerable Doctor of Divinity.' That there is ſomewhat of myſtery in this account, and more eſpecially in the parentheſis relating to Shakeſpeare, the reader will eaſily diſcern; but whether a modern writer has truly interpreted Mr. Wood's meaning, muſt be left to the reader's judgment (3). 'His 'father's houſe, ſays Mr. Jacob, being frequented 'by the famous Shakeſpeare in his journies to War-'wickſhire, his poetical genius in his youth, was, 'by that means, very much encouraged, and ſome 'will have it, that the handſome landlady, as well 'as the good wine, invited the Tragedian to thoſe 'quarters.' Thus much is certain, that our author admired Shakeſpeare more than any Engliſh Poet, and that one of the firſt eſſays of his muſe was a poem upon his death, which happened when Davenant was about ten years old. The reader perhaps will not be diſpleaſed to ſee it (4).

kept, at that time, a grammar-ſchool in the pariſh of All Saints in Oxford (d), where he was ſo happy as to breed up ſeveral perſons, who, afterwards, became eminent for their learning and abilities. In the year 1621, the ſame in which his father was Mayor of the city, he was entered a member of the Univerſity of Oxford in Lincoln-College, under the tuition of Mr. Daniel Hough (e): but the Oxford Hiſtorian is of opinion, that he did not ſtay there long (f), but, being ſtrongly affected to lighter ſtudies, and perhaps encouraged by ſome of the young Noblemen and Gentlemen with whom he became acquainted there, he quitted the ſeat of the Muſes, in hopes of making his fortune at Court, where he became firſt Page to Frances Ducheſs of Richmond, a Lady very famous in thoſe days, who had a great influence at Court, and who kept a kind of court of her own (g). He afterwards removed into the family of Sir Fulk Grevile Lord Brooke, who being himſelf a man of parts and learning, and much addicted to Poetry, he ſtood very high in his favour, and might, very probably, have made a figure in the world under his patronage, if that noble Peer had not been ſuddenly deprived of life by the hands of a barbarous aſſaſſin, September 30th, 1628 (h). By this unfortunate accident Mr. Davenant was left quite at large, but, however, without any detriment to his fortune, ſince we find that the year enſuing he produced his firſt play to the world, which was very well received, and to which ſome very honourable recommendations were prefixed when it was printed [B]. He ſpent the next eight years of his life in a conſtant attendance upon the Court, where nobody was better received, or more highly careſſed, being particularly intimate with Thomas Carew, Eſq; Endymion Porter, Eſq; Sir John Suckling, Mr. Henry Jermyn, the Honourable Henry Howard, and, in a word, with all the great wits of that time: nor was he leſs regarded by the Earl of Dorſet, the Lord Treaſurer Weſton, and other great men (i), notwithſtanding an unlucky accident that did no ſmall injury to his handſome face, which the Oxford Hiſtorian aſſures us, aroſe from his familiarity with a handſome black girl in Axe-yard, in Weſtminſter (k), and which expoſed him to a good deal of raillery [C]. In this ſpace of time he wrote ſeveral plays, and many more poems, which

The pitious river wept itſelf away,
Long ſince (alas! to ſuch a ſwift decay,)
That reach the map and look,
If you a river there can ſpie,
And for a river your mock'd eye,
Will find a ſhallow brook.

Will Dav'nant aſham'd of a fooliſh miſchance,
That he had got lately trav'ling in France;
Modeſtly hop'd th' handſomeneſs of 's muſe,
Might any deformity about him excuſe.

Surely the company had been content,
If they could have found any precedent;
But in all their records, in verſe or in proſe,
There was none of a Laureat who wanted a noſe.

And, as if this had been a jeſt that could never die, in a poem written ſome years after with the ſame title, there was another bold ſtroke at poor Sir William Davenant's diſfigured viſage, but with more of ill nature, and much leſs of wit in it (10).

Damn'd Holden, with's dull German Princeſs appear'd,
Whom if Dav'nant begot, as ſome do ſuppoſe,
Apollo ſaid the pillory ſhould crop off his ears,
And make them more ſuitable unto his noſe.

But, what is moſt extraordinary, Mr. Davenant himſelf could not forget the authoreſs of his misfortune, but has introduced her into his Gondibert, and, as the Criticks think, a little improperly. He brings two friends, Ulfinore the elder, and Goltho the younger, on a journey to the Court of Gondibert; but in their paſſage, to ſhew, as he would ſuggeſt, the frailty of youth, they were arreſted by a very unlooked-for accident, in ſpite of the wiſe counſels which Ulfinore had juſt received from his father (11).

(11) Gondibert, B. iii. Cant. 6. Stanza 31.

For a black beauty did her pride diſplay,
Through a large window, and in jewels ſhone,
As if to pleaſe the world, weeping for day,
Night had put all her ſtarry jewels on.

This beauty gaz'd on both, and Ulfinore
Hung down his head, but yet did lift his eyes
As if he fain would ſee a little more,
For much, though baſhful, he did beauty prize.

Goltho did like a bluſhleſs ſtatue ſtare,
Boldly her practis'd boldneſs did out-look,
And ev'n for fear ſhe would miſtruſt her ſnare,
Was ready to cry out, That he was took!

[B] Were prefixed when it was printed.] The title of this firſt dramatick piece of our author's runs thus:

I. ALBOVINE King of the Lombards, his Tragedy, Lond. 1629, 4*to*.

This work is founded upon true Hiſtory, and our author ſeems to have drawn his materials both from antient and modern writers (5). He imitates Shakeſpeare in many places, and copies him in ſome. Mr. Langbaine ſays it was dedicated to the Right Honourable the Duke of Somerſet (6), in which ſtrange miſtake he is followed by later writers; but the Play itſelf plainly proves, that it was addreſſed to the unfortunate Robert Ker, Earl of Somerſet (7); and it is very evident from thence, that this Nobleman was not ſo little conſidered under his misfortunes as is generally imagined. It was juſtly eſteemed a very good firſt Play, and as ſuch is commended to the world by eight copies of verſes, all written by eminent men, of whom we will mention three, Sir Henry Blount, Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, and the Honourable Henry Howard.

[C] To a good deal of raillery.] The plain fact is, that Mr. Davenant, being very amorous, was ſo unlucky as to carry the tokens of his irregular gallantries in the depreſſion of his noſe, which afforded the ſatyrick wits of thoſe times a pregnant ſubject for a kind of familiar abuſe, which affected him as little, or perhaps leſs, than it would any other man (8). This accident happened pretty early in his life, ſince it gave occaſion to the following ſtanzas in Sir John Suckling's Seſſions of the Poets, which I have tranſcribed from a very correct copy (9).

which he addreſſed to the principal perſons of the Court, and was alſo employed in framing ſeveral maſques, that were acted at court, not only by the principal nobility of both ſexes, but one in which even the Queen herſelf vouchſafed to take a ſhare, though it gave very high offence to the ſcrupulous moraliſts of thoſe times (l). By theſe performances he raiſed his poetical character to a very great height; moſt of his pieces, whatever may be thought of them now, being then eſteemed the beſt of their kind, and, as ſuch, highly applauded by thoſe who were thought the ableſt judges (m). We ſhall mention their titles, and a few remarkable particulars that relate to them, in the notes [D]. Upon the death of the juſtly celebrated Benjamin Johnſon, in 1637, our Poet ſucceeded to his laurel; which gave very high offence to Mr. Thomas May, who was his competitor; and though it was well enough known, that Mr. Davenant owed his preferment to the favour of the Queen, yet his rival carried his ſpleen ſtill higher, and, from being a warm courtier, became not only a warmer maleçontent, but diſtinguiſhed himſelf afterwards againſt his Royal Maſter, both as an Advocate and an Hiſtorian to the Parliament (n). As for Mr. Davenant, he continued very ſtedfaſt in his old road, adhered to his old principles, and his old friends, writing from time to time new poems, exhibiting new plays, and having the chief direction and management of the Court diverſions, ſo long as the diſorders of thoſe times would permit (o). Of theſe pieces alſo we ſhall ſay ſo much as is neceſſary at the bottom of the page [E]. When the troubles began, Mr. Davenant had an early ſhare in them; much wit, deep contrivance, and a quick ſucceſſion of buſy ſcenes handſomely expreſſed. Some of our later Poets, who had read this piece, loſt nothing by their reading; and if it were not an invidious taſk, one might ſhew where and what they gained.

III. The CRUEL BROTHER, a Tragedy, London, 1630, 4*to*.

This is dedicated to Richard Lord Weſton, at that time Lord High Treaſurer of England. The author acknowledges, in this Dedication, ſome errors in the piece itſelf; and in this, no doubt, the Criticks will allow him a ſound judgment: it ſeems however to have been pretty well received.

IV. COELUM BRITANNICUM, a Maſque at Whitehall, in the Banquetting-Houſe, on Shrove Tueſday night, the 18th of February 1633.

It was attributed to our author, though the machinery, which was very fine, was contrived and executed by Inigo Jones, and part of the piece itſelf written by Tho. Carew (12). The King himſelf wore a maſk in this piece, and the reſt of the performers were men of the firſt quality in the three nations (13). This we find omitted in Mr. Langbaine's catalogue.

This maſque, at the requeſt of the honourable ſociety of the Middle Temple, was invented and written by our author in three days, and was preſented by the members thereof as an entertainment to the Prince Elector. The muſick of the ſongs and ſymphonies was compoſed by Mr. Henry and Mr. William Lawes, his Majeſty's ſervants (14).

VI. Platonick Lovers, a Tragi-Comedy, London, 1636, 4*to*.

VII. The Wits, a Comedy, London, 1636, 4*to*.

This play is dedicated to our author's true friend, and early patron, Endymion Porter, Eſq; one of the Gentlemen of the King's bed-chamber. There is a copy of verſes in vindication of it, prefixed by Thomas Carew, Eſq. It was favourably received by the publick after it's firſt performance, in which it ran ſome riſk of being loſt, and was for many years acted with great applauſe.

VIII. BRITANNIA TRIUMPHANS, a Maſque preſented at Whitehall by the King's Majeſty and his Lords, on Sunday after Twelfth night, anno 1637, 4*to*.

This piece is not inſerted in Mr. Langbaine's catalogue, or in the folio edition of our author's works, but has been very lately printed in Ireland.

II. The JUST ITALIAN, a Tragi-Comedy, London, 1630, 4*to*.

This dramatick performance is dedicated to Edward Earl of Dorſet, whoſe favourable opinion of it ſaved it from the condemnation of a haſty audience. It is introduced by two copies of verſes, one written by Mr. William Hopkins, and the other by Mr. Thomas Carew; and it cannot certainly be denied to have them; for he was accuſed to the Parliament of being embarked in a deſign in May 1641, for bringing up the army for the defence of the King's perſon, and the ſupport of his authority, into which he was very probably drawn by his friends, there being many of them deep in this ſcheme, ſuch as Mr. Henry Piercy, afterwards Lord Piercy, Mr. Goring, Mr. Jermyn, Mr. Aſhburnham, Sir John Suckling, and others (p). Moſt of theſe, upon the diſcovery of their deſign, ſought to ſecure themſelves by flight, and Mr. Davenant among the reſt; but a Proclamation being publiſhed for apprehending him, he was ſtopped at Feverſham, ſent up to town, and put into the cuſtody of a Serjeant at Arms (q). In the month of July following he was bailed, and, not long after, finding it expedient to withdraw to France, he had the misfortune to be ſeized again in Kent, by the Mayor of Canterbury. At laſt, however, he had the good luck to compleat his intention, and to retire beyond the ſeas, where he continued for ſome time (r). But the Queen ſending over a conſiderable quantity of military ſtores, for the uſe of the Earl of Newcaſtle's army, Mr. Davenant (s) came over with them, offered his ſervice to that noble Peer, who was his old friend and patron, and was by him made Lieutenant-General of his Ordnance (t), to the no ſmall diſlike of ſome, who thought that a poſt very unfit for a Poet; in which, however, they made no great compliment to their General, who wrote poems and plays as well as Mr. Davenant (u). It is very probable, that he took ſome pains to qualify himſelf effectually for his duty in that capacity, ſince, in the month of September, 1643 (w), he received the honour of knighthood from the King, at the ſiege of Glouceſter, as a mark of the ſatisfaction he took in his ſervices, at a ſeaſon when he had a very fair opportunity of diſcovering who they were that deſerved that character. His Muſe, in the midſt of theſe toils and troubles, ſometimes raiſed her voice, and the ſame gratitude he had expreſſed to former patrons, he was inclined to ſhew to ſuch as protected his fortunes now, ſome inſtances of which were made public [F]. It does not appear how he came to leave the northern army, nor have we any accounts of his military ſervices after the time before-mentioned; but, after the King's affairs began to

The ſubject was ſet down by our author and Inigo Jones; the invention, ornament, ſcenes, &c. by the latter, and what was ſpoken or ſung was written by Mr. Davenant, then her Majeſty's ſervant; and the muſick compoſed by Lewis Richard, Maſter of her Majeſty's muſick (15). This piece is likewiſe omitted in Mr. Langbaine's catalogue, and in the collections of Davenant's works, which however is a point of injuſtice: for though no queſtion can be made that Inigo Jones was a man of exalted genius, yet convincing evidence might be brought to prove, that in matters of this nature few people had a more lively imagination, or a taſte more correct, than our author.

It muſt have been ſome time within this period, that he publiſhed the firſt edition of his Miſcellaneous Poems, which I muſt confeſs I have never ſeen, but I am acquainted with their contents from later editions. Theſe conſiſted of addreſſes to his patrons and his friends, of new years compliments to the Queen, of prologues and epilogues to his own and other mens plays, and other things of a like nature. It muſt be confeſſed, that as a great part of them were written while he was a very young man, ſo they want this apology to palliate the roughneſs of ſome, and the want of eaſe and perſpicuity in others; though in his ſucceeding works he is not at all liable to this cenſure. But whatever exceptions may be taken to his poetical character in theſe juvenile performances, we muſt allow, that the candour, gratitude, tenderneſs, friendſhip, and good nature, expreſſed in them, make ſufficient amends, inaſmuch as it plainly proves, that, if we allow for the ſtate of our poetry at that time, he deſerved to be admired for his parts. The many amiable qualities of his mind rendered him alſo very juſtly beloved.

[F] Some inſtances of which were made publick.] It is very probable, that the two following pieces were written ſome years earlier than they were printed, for it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that after Mr. Davenant had fallen ſo grievouſly under the diſpleaſure of the Parliament, he could have any great intercourſe with his Stationer at London; ſo that it is more likely, theſe plays having been formerly acted with applauſe, were now printed in the abſence, though not without the conſent, of their author.

XI. The unfortunate Lovers, a Tragedy, London, 1643, and again in 1649, 4*to*.

This tragedy is founded upon an Italian ſtory, was received very kindly at the time of it's appearance, and was often acted after the Reſtoration. It is ſomewhat ſtrange that this ſhould be omitted in Mr. Langbaine's catalogue of our author's works, notwithſtanding it is mentioned by Winſtanley (16), and which is more in Mr. Langbaine's own catalogue of plays.

XII. Love and Honour, a Tragi-Comedy, Lond. 1649, 4*to*.

The ſcene is laid in Savoy, and after dramatick entertainments were revived again, Mr. Langbaine aſſures us, that he has ſeen this play often acted with applauſe, at the play-houſe in Lincoln's-inn fields, and afterwards at the theatre in Dorſet Garden (17). In point of ſtile it reſembled Shakeſpeare rather than Fletcher, and is more correctly finiſhed than any of Sir William Davenant's former plays, which ſhews that he was not hurt by the applauſe that he had met with, but thought himſelf obliged to labour hard, and take ſo much the more pains to deſerve it. Both theſe plays are without any teſtimonies of the author's friends before them, becauſe publiſhed at a time, when, perhaps, there were not many who were inclined to inform the world that they were his friends.

XIII. MADAGASCAR, with other poems, London, 1648, 8*vo*. 2*d* edit.

His Madagaſcar was addreſſed to Prince Rupert, and muſt have been written many years before, ſince there are ſome commendatory verſes addreſſed to him expreſsly upon this poem, by his old friend Sir John Suckling, who died about ſix years before the printing of this edition. There are ſome other commendatory verſes alſo, that were prefixed to the firſt edition, and were reprinted now; and amongſt theſe likewiſe there is a copy of Sir John Suckling's. We may diſcern from the printing of this ſecond edition at that juncture, how much the poetick talent of Sir William Davenant was then admired, ſince it is plain he could then have no other patron than the publick, being himſelf an exile in France, and many of his friends with him. The dedicatory inſcription before theſe poems is very ſingular and laudable, and as at the ſame time it is very ſhort, the reader will probably be well pleaſed to peruſe it. Thus it runs:

If theſe POEMS live, may their memories by whom they were cheriſhed, ENDYM. PORTER, H. JERMYN, live with them.

decline, he judged it neceſſary to retire into France, where he was extremely well received by the Queen (x) and, it ſeems, was taken much into her confidence, ſince we find him embarked in a negotiation of great importance, when the King was at Newcaſtle, which was in the ſummer of 1646. Before this time Sir William had embraced the Popiſh Religion, which, we have reaſon to judge, might be a concurring, if not a principal, cauſe of his being employed at this time, and upon ſuch an occaſion. The noble Hiſtorian (y), who had always a particular friendſhip for him, has given a full account of it, though not much to his advantage, but ſtill with all the tenderneſs due to his acknowledged ſenſe of Sir William's good intentions, and of that long and intimate acquaintance that had ſubſiſted between them; which is ſo much more worthy the reader's notice, as it has entirely eſcaped the obſervation of moſt of thoſe, who have undertaken to give us this Gentleman's memoirs, though the moſt remarkable paſſage in his whole life (z) [G]. Upon his return to Paris, he fell in with that ſet of people, who laboured to ſilence the ſtorm of their ſorrows by ſome kind of amuſement. His were literary; and the deſire he had of writing an heroic poem, meeting with much leiſure, and ſome encouragement, led him to undertake one of a new kind, the two firſt books of which he finiſhed at the Louvre, where he lived with his old friend Lord Jermyn; and theſe, with a ſenſible preface, addreſſed to Mr. Hobbes, his anſwer, and ſome commendatory poems, were publiſhed in England (a). All, however, were not captivated by Sir William's verſe, or frighted into ſilence by the Philoſopher of Malmſbury's proſe; ſo that the worth of this work was quickly drawn into queſtion, and, upon this, the King's little Court were extremely divided (b). Fame, however, was ſo thin a diet, that Sir William Davenant was willing to venture into any climate that promiſed a better: yet, like a worthy man, he had a view to his country's good, while he conſulted his own. He had heard, that vaſt improvements might be made in the loyal colony of Virginia, in caſe they had proper artificers, and, finding there were many of theſe in France, who were deſtitute of employment, he formed a very wiſe and honeſt project of removing induſtrious men, who were in want of bread, to a fruitful country that was in want of them; which having, by the aſſiſtance of Queen Henrietta-Maria, brought to bear, he embarked, with his little colony, at one of the ports in Normandy (c). But, as he was a moſt unlucky traveller, ſo, before his veſſel was clear of the French coaſt, ſhe was met by one of the Parliament ſhips of war, taken and carried into the Iſle of Wight, where our diſappointed projector was ſent cloſe priſoner to Cowes-Caſtle (d), and there had leiſure enough, and, which is more extraordinary, wanted not inclination to reſume his heroic poem; and, having written about half the third book, in a very gloomy priſon, he thought fit to ſtop ſhort again, finding himſelf, as he imagined, under the very ſhadow of death. This part of his poem was alſo publiſhed, and was, in thoſe days, well received (e) [H]. In this ſituation

[G] Though the moſt remarkable paſſage in his whole life.] The King, in retiring to the Scots, had followed the advice of the French Ambaſſador, who had promiſed on their behalf, if not more than he had authority to do, at leaſt more than they were inclined to perform. To juſtify however his conduct at home, he was inclined to throw the weight in ſome meaſure upon the King, and with this view, he, by an expreſs, informed Cardinal Mazarine, that his Majeſty was too reſerved in giving the Parliament ſatisfaction, and therefore deſired that ſome perſon might be ſent over, who might have a ſufficient degree of credit with that Monarch, to perſuade him to ſuch compliances as were neceſſary for his ſervice. 'The Queen, ſays the Noble Hiſtorian (18), who was never adviſed by thoſe who either underſtood or valued his true intereſt, conſulted with thoſe about her, and ſent Sir William Davenant, an honeſt man and a witty, but in all reſpects inferior to ſuch a truſt, with a letter of credit to the King, who knew the perſon well enough under another character than was like to give him much credit in the argument in which he was intruſted, although her Majeſty had likewiſe otherwiſe declared her opinion to his Majeſty, "That "he ſhould part with the Church for his peace and "ſecurity." Sir William Davenant had, by the countenance of the French Ambaſſador, eaſy admiſſion to the King, who heard him patiently all he had to ſay, and anſwered him in that manner that made it evident he was not pleaſed with the advice. When he found his Majeſty unſatisfied, and that he was not like to conſent to what was ſo earneſtly deſired by them by whoſe advice he was ſent, who undervalued all thoſe ſcruples of conſcience which his Majeſty himſelf was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with, he took upon himſelf the confidence to offer ſome reaſons to the King to induce him to yield to what was propoſed, and among other things ſaid, 'It was the 'opinion and advice of all his friends,' his Majeſty aſking 'What friends?' and he anſwering, ſaid, 'that it was the opinion of the Lord Jermyn;' the King ſaid, 'that the Lord Jermyn did not under-'ſtand any thing of the Church.' The other ſaid, 'the Lord Colepepper was of the ſame mind.' The King ſaid, 'Colepepper had no religion,' and aſked, 'Whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer was of 'that mind?' to which he anſwered he did not know, for that he was not there, and had deſerted the Prince, and thereupon ſaid ſomewhat from the Queen, of the diſpleaſure ſhe had conceived againſt the Chancellor, to which the King ſaid, 'The Chan-'cellor was an honeſt man, and would never deſert 'him, nor the Prince, nor the Church, and that he 'was ſorry he was not with his ſon, but that his 'wife was miſtaken.' Davenant then offering ſome reaſons of his own, in which he mentioned the Church ſlightingly, as if it were not of importance enough to weigh down the benefit that would attend the conceſſion, his Majeſty was tranſported with ſo much indignation, that he gave him a ſharper reprehenſion than was uſual for him to give to any other man, and forbid him to preſume to come again into his preſence. Whereupon the poor man, who had in truth very good affections, was exceedingly dejected and afflicted, and returned into France to give an account of his ill ſucceſs to thoſe who ſent him.

[H] And was in thoſe days well received.] He publiſhed at Paris a diſcourſe upon this poem by way of preface to it, in a letter to Mr. Thomas Hobbes, dated from the Louvre at Paris, January 2, 1650, with the anſwer of Mr. Hobbes, dated at Paris, January situation we find him in October 1650, and, indeed, in a worſe ſituation no man could well be, the Parliament having delivered him over, by an ordinance, to be tried by a high

January 10, the ſame year (19). Mr. Waller and Mr. Cowley wrote commendatory verſes on the two firſt books of this poem. The three firſt books of it were printed under the following title, GONDIBERT, an Heroic Poem, written by Sir WILLIAM DAVENANT. The ſeventh and laſt canto of the third book, was printed at London, in 8*vo*. 1685 (20). Mr. Hobbes, in his letter above-mentioned, affirms, that he never yet ſaw a poem that had ſo much ſhape of art, health of morality, and vigour and beauty of expreſſion, as this of our author. But that gentleman obſerves in his letter to the Honourable Edward Howard, on his intended impreſſion of his poem of the Britiſh Princes, dated at Chatſworth, November 6, 1668, 'that his judgment in poetry hath been once 'already cenſured by very good wits for commend-'ing Gondibert. But yet have they not I think, 'continues he, diſabled my teſtimony. For what 'authority is there in wit? a jeſter may have it; a 'man in drink may have it, and be fluent over-'night, and wiſe and dry in the morning. What 'is it? or, Who can tell whether it be better to 'have it or be without it, eſpecially if it be a pointed 'wit? I will take my liberty to praiſe what I like, 'as well as they do to reprehend what they do not 'like.' Mr. Langbaine tells us, that it was deſigned by him to be an imitation of an Engliſh drama, it being to be divided into five books, as the other is into five acts; the cantos to be the parallel of the ſcenes, with this difference, that this is delivered narratively, the other dialogue-wiſe (21). The Honourable Edward Howard, Eſq; tells us, 'that in 'this poem there are many remote and excellent 'thoughts, with apt and perſpicuous expreſſions, 'the eſſential dignities of the Muſes; whoſe chiefeſt 'beauties flow from the ornaments of words, and 'delightful variety of imagination; from which 'choice productions of nature, the Muſes are moſt 'deſirous to adopt their children, and, in no ſmall 'degree, are juſtly acknowledged to the honour of 'his pen. Notwithſtanding which, his heroick poem 'of Gondibert, coming into the world in a capricious 'time of cenſure, perhaps did not meet with a de-'ſerved reception, though the ſevereſt judges, I 'doubt not, are forced to grant, that there is in 'that work more to be praiſed than pardoned.' Mr. Thomas Rymer obſerves (22), that our author's wit is well known, and that in the preface to this poem there appear ſome ſtrokes of an extraordinary judgment; that he is for unbeaten tracks and new ways of thinking; but that certainly in his untried ſeas he is no great diſcoverer. One deſign of the Epick Poets before him, was to adorn their own country, there finding their heroes and patterns of virtue, whoſe example, as they thought, would have the greateſt influence and power over poſterity. 'But 'this Poet, ſays Mr. Rymer, ſteers a different courſe: 'his heroes are all foreigners; he cultivates a country 'that is nothing akin to him; it is Lombardy that 'reaps the honour of all. Other Poets chooſe ſome 'action or heroe ſo illuſtrious, that the name of the 'poem prepared the reader, and made way for it's 'reception. But in this poem none can divine what 'great action he intended to celebrate, nor is the 'reader obliged to know whether the heroe be Turk 'or Chriſtian. Nor do the firſt lines give any light 'or proſpect into his deſign. Methinks, though his 'religion could not diſpenſe with an invocation, he 'needed not have ſcrupled at the propoſition. Yet 'he rather chooſes to enter in at the top of the 'houſe, becauſe the mortals of mean and ſatisfied 'minds go in at the door. And I believe the reader 'is not well pleaſed to find his poem begin with the 'praiſes of Aribert, when the title has promiſed a 'Gondibert. But before he falls on any other buſi-'neſs, he preſents the reader with a particular de-'ſcription of each heroe, not troſting their actions 'to ſpeak for them as former Poets have done. 'Their practice was fine and artificial, his he tells 'us is a new way. Many of his characters have but 'little of the heroick in them; Dalga is a jilt proper 'only for Comedy; Birtha, for a Paſtoral; and 'Aſtragon, in the manner here deſcribed, yields no 'very great ornament to an heroick poem: nor are 'his battles leſs liable to cenſure than thoſe of 'Homer. He dares not, as other Heroick Poets, 'heighten the action by making Heaven and Hell 'intereſted, for fear of offending againſt probability, 'and yet he tells us of '—— Threads by patient Parcæ ſlowly ſpun.

'And for being dead his phraſe is,

'Heaven call'd him where peacefully he rules a ſtar.

'And the emerald he gives to Birtha has a ſtronger 'tang of the old woman, and is a greater improba-'bility, than all the enchantments in Taſſo. A juſt 'medium reconciles the fartheſt extremes, and one 'preparation may give credit to the moſt unlikely 'fiction. In Marino, Adonis is preſented with a 'diamond ring, where indeed the ſtone is much-'what of the ſame nature; but this preſent is made 'by Venus, and from a goddeſs could not be ex-'pected a gift of ordinary virtue.' The ſame Critick afterwards tells us, 'that the ſort of verſe of which 'Sir William makes choice, might contribute much 'to the vitiating of his ſtile; for thereby he obliges 'himſelf to ſtretch every period to the end of four 'lines. Thus the ſenſe is broken perpetually with 'parentheſes, the words jumbled in confuſion, and 'a darkneſs ſpread over all; ſo that the ſenſe is 'either not diſcerned, or found not ſufficient, for 'one juſt verſe which is ſprinkled on the whole 'tetraſtich. In the Italian and Spaniſh, where all 'the rhymes are diſſyllable, and the percuſſion 'ſtronger, this kind of verſe may be neceſſary; and 'yet, to temper that grave march, they repeat the 'ſame rhyme over again, and then they cloſe the 'ſtanza with a couplet farther to ſweeten the ſeverity. 'But in French and Engliſh, where we rhyme gene-'rally with only one ſyllable, the ſtanza is not al-'lowed, much leſs the alternate rhyme in long 'verſe, for the ſound of the monoſyllable rhyme is 'either loſt before we come to it's correſpondent, or 'we are in pain by the ſo long expectation and ſuſ-'pence. This alternate rhyme, and the downright 'morality throughout whole cantos together, ſhew 'Davenant better acquainted with the Quatrains of 'Pybrach which he ſpeaks of, than with any true 'models of Epick Poeſy. After all, Davenant is 'ſaid to have a particular talent for the manners; 'his thoughts are great; and there appears ſome-'thing roughly noble throughout this fragment, 'which had he been pleaſed to finiſh, it would 'doubtleſs not have been left ſo open to the attack 'of Criticks.' All theſe objections to the meaſure of the verſe, had been foreſeen, conſidered, and anſwered, by Sir William Davenant: but inſtead of troubling the reader with what he has delivered very well, but very much at large, upon this ſubject, we will content ourſelves with ſaying, that his reaſons had ſo much weight with Mr. Dryden, a better Poet indeed than him, and at the ſame time a better Critick than Mr. Rymer, that he thought fit to imitate him in the choice of his ſtanza, and gives the following reaſons for it in a letter to Sir Robert Howard (23). 'I have, ſays he, choſen to write my 'poem in quatrains or ſtanzas of four, in alternate 'rhyme, becauſe I have ever judged them more 'noble, and of greater dignity, both for the ſound 'and number, than any other verſe in uſe amongſt 'us, in which I am ſure I have your approbation. 'The learned languages have certainly a great 'advantage over us, in not being tied to the ſlavery 'of any rhyme, and were leſs conſtrained in the 'quantity of every ſyllable, which they might vary 'with ſpondees or dactyls, beſides ſo many other 'helps of grammatical figures, for the lengthening high commiſſion Court, where, ſuppoſing that innocence might have been ſafe, it was pretty difficult to know how a man ſhould prove himſelf innocent (f). He was conveyed from the Iſle of Wight to the Tower of London, and, for ſome time, his life was in the utmoſt hazard; nor is it well known how it was ſaved. Some ſay, that two Aldermen of York, to whom he had been very kind when they were priſoners, and when he had a high command in the Marquis of Newcaſtle's army, interpoſed out of gratitude (g); others, that Milton was his friend (h), and prevented the utmoſt effects of party rage from deſcending on the head of this ſon of the Muſes. But, whoever ſaved his life, we find him two years after a priſoner in the Tower, where he obtained ſome indulgence by the favour of the Lord Keeper Whitelocke (i); upon receiving which he wrote him a letter of thanks, that would have ſecured him the reputation of the politeſt pen of thoſe times, if nothing of his had remained beſides [I]. This liberty of his left him only room to ſolicit farther favours, which he likewiſe obtained, and was, at laſt, entirely delivered from every thing but the narrowneſs of his circumſtances; and againſt theſe, encouraged by the intereſt of his friends, he likewiſe made a bold effort. He knew very well, that a Play-houſe was utterly inconſiſtent with the purity of thoſe times, and yet, if he could open any thing like one, it would be ſure to be well filled. He managed his project with great addreſs, and by degrees brought it to bear: and, having the countenance of Lord Whitelocke, Sir John Maynard, and other perſons of great rank (k), who were aſhamed of the hypocriſy that then prevailed, he opened a kind of a theatre at Rutland-Houſe, where ſeveral pieces were acted; and theſe, if they did not gain him reputation, brought him money, of which, at that time, he ſtood in great need. The firſt of theſe entertainments, for that was the name they originally bore, was performed May 21ſt, and publiſhed September the third, 1656 (l). 'or abbreviation of them, than the modern are in 'the cloſe of that one ſyllable, which often confines, 'and more often corrupts, the ſenſe of all the reſt. 'But in this neceſſity of our rhymes I have always 'found the couplet verſe moſt eaſy, though not ſo 'proper for this occaſion; for there the work is 'ſooner at an end, every two lines concluding the 'labour of the Poet; but in quatrains he is to carry 'it farther on, and not only ſo, but to bear along 'in his head the troubleſome ſenſe of four lines 'together. For thoſe who write correctly in this 'kind muſt needs acknowledge, that the laſt line of 'the ſtanza is to be conſidered in the compoſition of 'the firſt. Neither can we give ourſelves the liberty 'of making any part of a verſe for the ſake of 'rhyme, or concluding with a word which is not 'current Engliſh, or uſing the variety of female 'rhymes, all which our fathers practiſed, and for 'the female rhymes they are ſtill in uſe amongſt 'other nations; with the Italian in every line, with 'the Spaniard promiſcuouſly, with the French alternately, as thoſe who have read the Alarique, the 'Pucelle, or any of their later poems, will agree 'with me. And beſides this they write in Alexandrins, or verſes of ſix feet, ſuch as, amongſt us, is 'the old tranſlation of Homer by Chapman. All 'which, by lengthening of their chain, makes the 'ſphere of their activity the larger. I have dwelt 'too long upon the choice of my ſtanza, which you 'may remember is much better defended in the Preface to Gondibert, and therefore I will haſten to 'acquaint you with my endeavours in the writing.'

A late learned Profeſſor of Greek in the univerſity of Aberdeen, cenſures the ſtructure of the poem; but at the ſame time pays a compliment to the abilities of the author (24). 'It was indeed, ſays he, a 'very extraordinary project of our ingenious country-'man, to write an Epick Poem without mixing al-'legory, or allowing the ſmalleſt fiction throughout 'the compoſure. It was like lopping off a man's 'limb, and then putting him upon running races, 'though it muſt be owned, that the performance 'ſhews with what ability he could have acquitted 'himſelf, had he been ſound and entire.' After all, it will, in the eye of a judicious reader, paſs for an inconteſtable proof of the merit of this poem, that it has been a ſubject of controverſy for more than a hundred years, that is, from it's firſt appearance to the preſent time. Perhaps the diſpute had been long ago decided, if the author's leiſure or inclination had permitted him to finiſh it. At preſent we ſee it to great diſadvantage, and if, in ſpite of this, it has any beauties, we may well conclude that it would have come much nearer perfection, if the ſtory begun with ſo much ſpirit, had been brought to an end upon the author's plan.

'obliged, moſt humble,
'and obedient ſervant,
'WILL. DAVENANT.'

[K] The beſt we can in the notes.] Some of the people then in power, it ſeems, were lovers of Muſick, and, at bottom perhaps, were wiſe enough to know, that there was nothing ſcandalous or immoral in the diverſions of the theatre: but this they did not think proper to own, and therefore perſecuted the poor Players who attempted to act privately, ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another, as if they had held ſeditious or lewd aſſemblies (26). Sir William Davenant therefore, when he applied for permiſſion, the ice was thus broken, he grew a little bolder, and not only ventured to write, but to act, ſeveral new plays, which were alſo ſomewhat in a new taſte; that is, they were more regular in their ſtructure, and the language, generally ſpeaking, ſmoother and more correct than in the old tragedies (m). Theſe improvements, there is good reaſon to believe, were, in a great meaſure, owing to Sir William's long reſidence in France, which gave him an opportunity of reading their beſt writers, and hearing the ſentiments of their ableſt critics upon dramatic entertainments, when they were as much admired and encouraged there as, for ſome years, they had been ſlighted and diſcountenanced in England. That theſe were really improvements, and that the public ſtood greatly indebted to Sir William Davenant, as a Poet as well as Maſter of a Theatre, may be put out of all doubt, if there be any regard due to Mr. Dryden's judgment [L]. Upon the commotions which preceded the Reſtoration, and particularly upon Sir George Booth's inſurrection, Sir William Davenant fell into freſh troubles, and underwent another impriſonment, from which, however, he was quickly releaſed (n). He complimented General Monk upon his good deſigns, and the great capacity he had ſhewn in the execution of them, in a ſhort poem, and his Majeſty King Charles the Second, upon his return, in a very long one (o). Soon after the Reſtoration there were two companies of players form-permiſſion, called what he intended to repreſent an Opera; but, when he brought it upon the ſtage, it appeared quite another thing, which, when printed, had the following title:

XIV. Firſt Day's Entertainment at Rutland-Houſe, by Declamation and Muſick, after the manner of the Ancients. Lond. 1656, 8*vo*.

This being an introductory piece, it required all the author's wit to make it anſwer different intentions; for, firſt, it was to be ſo pleaſing as to gain applauſe; and next, it was to be ſo remote from the very appearance of a play, as not to give any offence to that pretended ſanctity which was then in faſhion. It began with muſick, then followed a prologue, in which the author banters the oddity of his own performance. The curtain being drawn up to the ſound of ſlow and ſolemn muſick, there followed a grave declamation by one in a gilded roſtrum, who perſonated Diogenes, and whoſe buſineſs was to rail at and expoſe publick entertainments. Then muſick in a lighter ſtrain, after which a perſon in the character of Ariſtophanes, the old comic Poet, anſwered Diogenes, and ſhewed the uſe and excellency of dramatick entertainments. The whole of the grave entertainment was concluded by a ſong, accompanied with muſick, in which the arguments on both ſides are ſuccinctly and elegantly ſtated. The ſecond part of the entertainment conſiſted of two lighter declamations; the firſt, by a citizen of Paris, who wittily rallies the follies of London; the other, by a citizen of London, who takes the ſame liberty with Paris, and it's inhabitants. To this was tacked a ſong, and after that came a ſhort epilogue. The muſick, which was very good, was compoſed by Dr. Coleman, Capt. Cook, Mr. Henry Lawes, Mr. George Hudſon.

XV. The Play-houſe to be Lett.

This was another very ſingular entertainment, compoſed of five acts, each being a diſtinct performance. The firſt act is introductory, ſhews the diſtreſs of the players in the time of vacation, that obliges them to lett their houſe, which ſeveral offer to take for different purpoſes, amongſt the reſt a Frenchman, who had brought over a troop of his countrymen to act a farce. This is performed in the ſecond act, which is a tranſlation of Moliere's Sganarelle, or, the Cuckold in Conceit; all in broken French, to make the people laugh. The third act is a ſort of comic opera, under the title of the Hiſtory of Sir Francis Drake. The fourth act is a ſerious opera, repreſenting the cruelties of the Spaniards in Peru. The fifth act is a burleſque in Heroicks, on the amours of Cæſar and Cleopatra; has a great deal of wit and humour, and was often acted afterwards by itſelf (27).

XVI. News from Plimouth, a Comedy.

XVII. Law againſt Lovers, a Tragi-Comedy.

This is compoſed out of two of Shakeſpeare's plays; Meaſure for Meaſure, and Much ado about Nothing. Mr. Langbaine gives a very good character of it (28); and, indeed, it is very ſmoothly and correctly written.

XIX. The Siege, a Tragi-Comedy.

The ſcene is laid at Piſa in Italy, and it derives it's title from the ſame cauſe with the former.

XX. The Fair Favourite, a Tragi-Comedy.

All theſe plays were acted in the time of Oliver and Richard, firſt printed in quarto, and afterwards reviſed, and inſerted in the author's works. To theſe we may add,

XXI. The Siege of RHODES, in two parts.

Theſe were a kind of operas, and acted to muſick. The author reviſed, altered, and augmented them, after the Reſtoration, when they had the honour of the King's preſence: they were alſo printed and publiſhed in folio, with a dedication to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, and very much eſteemed.

[L] If there be any regard due to Mr. Dryden's judgment.] What we have ventured to advance in the text and notes, in favour of an author and his works, now ſo little regarded, ſeems to ſtand in need of ſome ſupport, and therefore we ſhall cite what ſo great a Poet, and ſo good a judge of Poetry, has written upon this ſubject, with regard to heroick plays. Mr. Dryden (30) tells us, 'The firſt light we had of 'them on the Engliſh theatre, was from the late Sir 'William Davenant. It being forbidden him, in 'the religious times, to act tragedies and comedies, 'becauſe they contained ſome matter of ſcandal to 'thoſe good people, who could more eaſily diſpoſſeſs 'their lawful Sovereign, than endure a wanton jeſt, 'he was forced to turn his thoughts another way, 'and to introduce the examples of moral virtue, writ 'in verſe, and performed in recitative muſick. The 'original of this muſick, and of the ſcenes which 'adorned his work, he had from the Italian operas; 'but he heightened his characters, as I may probably imagine, from the examples of Corneille, and 'ſome French Poets. In this condition did this part 'of Poetry remain at his Majeſty's return, when 'growing bolder, as now being owned by publick 'authority, Davenant reviewed his Siege of Rhodes, 'and cauſed it to be acted as a juſt drama. But, 'as few men have the happineſs to begin and finiſh 'any new project, ſo neither did he live to make his 'deſign perfect. There wanted the fullneſs of a 'plot, and the variety of characters, to form it as it 'ought; and, perhaps, ſomewhat might have been 'added to the beauty of the ſtile; all which he 'would have performed with more exactneſs, had he 'pleaſed to have given us another work of the ſame 'nature. For myſelf, and others who come after 'him, we are bound, with all veneration to his 'memory, to acknowledge what advantage we received from that excellent ground-work which he 'laid; and, ſince it is an eaſy thing to add to what 'already is invented, we ought all of us, without 'envy to him, or partiality to ourſelves, to yield 'him the precedence in it.'

ed, one under the title of the King's Servants, the other under that of the Duke's Company, both by patents from the Crown; the firſt granted to Henry Killigrew, Eſq; and the latter to Sir William Davenant (p). The King's Company acted firſt at the Red Bull, at the upper end of St. John's-ſtreet; from thence they removed to a new Play-houſe in Vere-ſtreet, Clare-market; and, after playing a year or two there, they eſtabliſhed themſelves in the Theatre-Royal in Drury-lane. As for Sir William Davenant, it was ſome time before he compleated his Company, into which he took all who had formerly played under Mr. Rhodes, in the Cockpit in Drury-lane, and, amongſt theſe, the famous Mr. Betterton, who appeared firſt to advantage, under the patronage of Sir William Davenant (q). He opened the Duke's Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields with his own dramatic performance of The Siege of RHODES, the Houſe being finely decorated, and the Stage ſupplied with painted ſcenes, which were by him introduced at leaſt, if not invented (r), affording certainly a great addition of beauty to dramatic entertainments, though ſome there are who have inſinuated, that fine ſcenes proved the ruin of fine acting [M]. We muſt not omit that, upon the King's return, and Sir William Davenant's having an intereſt at Court, he gave a noble inſtance of his gratitude to Mr. Milton, who had been ſo inſtrumental in ſaving his life ten years before, by rendering him the like ſervice, and preſerving him from feeling the effects of that reſentment which was ſo ſtrong againſt him, that many writers have conſidered his as a kind of miraculous eſcape (s). After all the ſtorms that he had met with, Sir William Davenant had the comfort of paſſing the laſt years of his life in credit and quiet. He transferred his company to the new and magnificent Theatre built in Dorſet-Gardens (t), where ſome of his old plays were revived, with very ſingular circumſtances of royal kindneſs and favour, and a new one, when brought upon the Stage, met with great applauſe. The laſt labour of his pen was in altering a play of Shakeſpeare's, ſo as to render it agreeable to that age, or rather, ſuſceptible of thoſe theatrical improvements which he had brought into faſhion; and in this alſo he had as much ſucceſs as he could expect; and, though he did not live to ſee the full effects of it, yet the higheſt tribute of praiſe has been paid, and the ſtricteſt juſtice done, to his memory and merit, by that excellent Poet, who ſucceeded to his laurel (u) [N]. [M] Proved the ruin of fine acting.] It may, poſſibly, afford ſome ſatisfaction to the reader, to have this point briefly explained. He has heard, that, in King Charles the Firſt's time, dramatick entertainments were accompanied with rich ſcenery, curious machines, and other elegant embelliſhments, proceeding chiefly from the ſkill and care, the great capacity and wonderful dexterity, of that celebrated Engliſh Architect Inigo Jones. But theſe were employed only in maſques at Court, and were too expenſive for the little theatres in which plays were then acted. In them there was nothing more than a curtain, of ſome very coarſe ſtuff, upon the drawing up of which the ſtage appeared either with bare walls on the ſides, coarſely matted, or covered with tapeſtry, ſo that for the place originally repreſented, and all the changes ſucceſſively in which the Poets of thoſe times indulged themſelves very freely, there was nothing to help the reader's underſtanding, or to aſſiſt the actor's performance, but bare imagination. It is true, that, while things continued in this ſituation, there were a great many play-houſes, ſometimes ſix or ſeven, open at once. Of theſe, ſome were large, and in part open, where they acted by day-light; others ſmaller, but better fitted up, where they made uſe of candles. The plainneſs of the theatre made the prices ſmall, and this drew abundance of company; yet, upon the whole, it may be well doubted, whether the ſpectators, in all theſe houſes, were really ſuperior in number to thoſe who have frequented the theatres in later times. If the ſpirit and judgment of the actors ſupplied all deficiencies, and made, as ſome would ſuggeſt, plays more intelligible without ſcenes than they afterwards were with them, it muſt be very aſtoniſhing at leaſt, if not incredible: neither is it difficult to aſſign another cauſe why thoſe, who were concerned in play-houſes, were angry with ſcenes and decorations, which was, that, notwithſtanding the advanced prices, their profits, from that time, were continually ſinking. An author, who ſeems to be very well acquainted with the ſubject on which he writes, aſſures us, that the whole ſharers in Mr. Hart's company divided a thouſand pounds a year apiece, before theſe new and expenſive decorations came into faſhion (31). Sir William Davenant conſidered things in another light: he was well acquainted with the alterations which the French theatre had received, under the auſpice of Cardinal Richlieu, who had an excellent taſte; and he remembered the elegant contrivances of Inigo Jones, which were not at all inferior to the deſigns of the beſt French maſters. Sir William was likewiſe ſenſible, that the Monarch he ſerved was an exquiſite judge of every thing of this kind; and all theſe conſiderations, taken together, excited in him a paſſion for the advancement of the theatre, to which without diſpute the great figure it has ſince made is chiefly owing. Mr. Dryden acknowledged his admirable talents in this way, and very gratefully remembers the pains taken by Sir William to ſet a work of his in the faireſt light poſſible, and to which he very ingenuouſly aſcribes, in a great meaſure, the ſucceſs with which it was received.

We come now to the works penned by our Laureat in the evening of his days; the laſt of which were,

In the preface to this play, which is dated Dec. 1ſt, 1669, Mr. Dryden gives the following account of the ſhare our author had in this performance, and is that which we have hinted at in the text. 'Sir 'William Davenant, ſays he, who was a man of 'quick and piercing imagination, ſoon found that 'ſomewhat might be added to the deſign of Shake-'ſpeare, of which neither Fletcher nor Suckling had

He died at his houſe in little Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, April 7th, 1668, aged ſixty-three (w), and, two days afterwards, was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey, when, to the great grief of honeſt Mr. Wood, there was an inexcuſable error committed in the ceremony; for, through haſte, the laurel-wreath was forgotten, which ſhould have been placed upon his coffin (x). On his grave-ſtone is inſcribed, in imitation of Ben Jonſon's ſhort epitaph, O RARE SIR WILLIAM DAVENANT! It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that his remains reſt very near the place, out of which, thoſe of Mr. Thomas May, Hiſtorian and Secretary to the Parliament, who cauſed him to be interred there with a fine monument and pompous inſcription, were removed (y). As to the character of our author (z), the reader may eaſily collect it from this account of his life and works; to facilitate which ſtill farther, ſome other particulars have been placed in the notes [O]. ' ever thought. And, therefore, to put the laſt ' hand to it, he deſigned the counterpart to Shake- ' ſpeare's plot, namely, that of a man who had ' never ſeen a woman, that, by this means, thoſe ' two characters, of Innocence and Love, might the ' more illuſtrate and commend each other. This ' excellent contrivance he was pleaſed to communi- ' cate to me, and to deſire my aſſiſtance in it. [O] Have been placed in the notes.] We have already mentioned a poem written ſome years after the Reſtoration, under the ſame title with Sir John Suckling's, viz. The Seſſions of the Poets: in this our author is a little ſeverely, not to ſay rudely, handled in the following ſtanzas (34).

(34) Dryden's Miſcellanies, vol. ii. p. 90.

Will. Davenant would fain have been ſteward o' th' court,
To have fin'd and amerc'd each man at his will,
But Apollo, it ſeems, had heard a report,
That his choice of new plays did ſhew h'ad no ſkill.

Beſides, ſome critics had ow'd him a ſpite,
And a little before had made the god fret,
By letting him know the Laureat did write
That damnable farce, The Houſe to be Lett.

The Hiſtorian of Oxford takes ſome pains to inform us, that, while our author was in that Univerſity, he made but a ſmall progreſs in the ſeverer parts of learning, but ſtriking out into the ſmoother road of Poetry, he at once indulged his own inclination, and diſcovered the force of his natural genius, which, without the aſſiſtance of any guides, and with but a very ſmall acquaintance with the ancients, enabled him to aſpire unto, and even acquire, the Laurel. This is very handſomely expreſſed by Dr. Fell, or whoever tranſlated Mr. Wood's ſentiments upon that ſubject (35). Sed ingenium ipſius, tam aſperis & horridis ſtudiis ſemper averſum ad amœniores Poëticæ campos ſtatim properavit. In his nemo lætiori decurſu, nemo feliciori volatu lauream promeruit, & quamvis omnibus veterum ſubſidiis deſtitutus ſolâ tamen ingenii vi, eos ita aſſequutus videtur, ut grande profectò rariſſimique exempli documentum dederit, quantum ſine arte ſola natura præſtare valeat. Mr. Dryden, who knew him better, and who was alſo a better judge, has given us a true picture of his poetick character (36). ' I found ' him, ſays he, of ſo quick a fancy, that nothing ' was propoſed to him on which he could not ſud- ' denly produce a thought, extremely pleaſant and ' ſurpriſing, and thoſe firſt thoughts of his, contrary ' to the old Latin proverb, were not always the leaſt ' happy. And, as his fancy was quick, ſo likewiſe ' were the products of it remote and new. He bor- ' rowed not of any other, and his imaginations were ' ſuch as could not eaſily enter into any other man. ' His corrections were ſober and judicious, and he ' corrected his own writings much more ſeverely than ' thoſe of another man, beſtowing twice the time ' and labour in poliſhing which he uſed in invention.' Thus, with all the induſtry in our power, we have collected, and, with all the care and application poſſible, have digeſted, the ſcattered memoirs of this once celebrated Poet; and, to juſtify our diligence therein, we will ſum up all by putting poſterity in mind, that it is to him we owe the ſetting our theatre upon a level with thoſe of France and Italy (37), the preſerving the greateſt genius for Poetry this nation ever produced (38), and the bringing upon the ſtage, and inſtructing, the ableſt actor that ever trod thereon (39).  [The obligations of the Engliſh Theatre to Sir William Davenant have been celebrated by various writers, and are ſufficiently diſplayed by our ingenious predeceſſor. It is remarkable, that not one of the numerous plays, which were written by Sir William, holds, at preſent, the poſſeſſion of the ſtage. This, however, is not owing to their want of merit; for it is ſaid that there are certainly ſome among them which much better deſerve the honour of being acted, than many pieces that are very frequently and ſucceſsfully repreſented (40).

(40) Biographia Dramatica, vol. i. p. 117.

The grand object on which Sir William Davenant's poetical reputation depends is his Gondibert; and there ſtill remains a diverſity of opinion concerning the light in which it ought to be conſidered. As, when it was firſt publiſhed, it was condemned by ſome perſons, and applauded by others, ſo, among the critics of the preſent day, it has met both with cenſurers and defenders.

Mr. Granger has ſpoken of it with a ſeverity which we do not uſually find in that amiable writer. " Sir William Davenant," ſays he, " was a man of " great natural and improved talents, which he un- " fortunately miſapplied. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf " by a bold, but unſucceſsful attempt to enlarge the " ſphere of poetry. He compoſed an heroic poem, " called " Gondibert" in five books, after the model " of the Drama; applauded himſelf greatly upon " this invention; and looked upon the followers of " Homer as a timorous, ſervile herd, that were " afraid to leave the beaten track. This perform- " ance, which is rather a ſtring of Epigrams than an " Epic Poem, was not without its admirers, among " whom were Waller and Cowley. But the ſucceſs " did not anſwer his expectation. When the novelty " of it was over, it preſently ſunk into contempt; " and he at length found, that when he ſtrayed " from Homer he deviated from nature (41)."

(41) Granger, vol. iv. p. 43.

Mr. Knox is alſo on the unfavourable ſide of the queſtion. " The Gondibert of Davenant," ſays this Gentleman, " has been the ſubject of critical " controverſy from the time of its publication. Its " plan was originally defended by the great Hobbes, " and its execution has been greatly praiſed. Yet " few have attended to it with any pleaſure, and " ſtill fewer have had a degree of patience ſufficient " to bear them through the peruſal of it. The truth " is, the ſtanza which he has adopted, is better " ſuited to elegiac than to heroic poetry. A beauti- " fully deſcriptive paſſage, interſperſed in the courſe " of two or three hundred lines, will not alleviate " the tedium of the reſt; as an occaſional flaſh of " lightning cannot illuminate the continued gloomi- " neſs of an extenſive proſpect (42)."

(42) Knox's Eſſays, vol. ii. p. 377.

The objections of Biſhop Hurd to the Gondibert are ſtill more important. " When a writer," ſays this ingenious and elegant critic, " who is driven by ſo many powerful motives to the imitation of preceding have not been able to collect any distinct account of it, farther than what regards two of his sons, concerning whom the reader will receive all the information we can give in the succeeding models, revolts against them all, and determines, at any rate, to be original, nothing can be expected but an awkward straining in every thing. Improper method, forced conceits, and affected expression, are the certain issue of such obstinacy. The business is to be unlike; and this he may very possibly be, but at the expence of graceful ease and true beauty. For he puts himself, at best, into a convulsed, unnatural state; and it is well, if he be not forced, beside his purpose, to leave common sense, as well as his model, behind him. Like one, who would break loose from an impediment, which holds him fast; the very endeavour to get clear of it throws him into uneasy attitudes, and violent contorsions; and, if he gain his liberty at last, it is by an effort, which carries him much further than the point, he would wish to stop at.

"And, that the reader may not suspect me of asserting this without experience, let me exemplify what has been here said in the case of a very eminent person, who, with all the advantages of art and nature that could be required to adorn the true poet, was ruined by this single error. The person I mean was Sir WILLIAM D'AVENANT; whose Gondibert will remain a perpetual monument of the mischiefs, which must ever arise from this affectation of originality in lettered and polite poets.

"The great author, when he projected his plan of an heroic poem, was so far from intending to steer his course by example, that he sets out, in his preface, with upbraiding the followers of Homer, as a base and timorous crew of coasters, who would not adventure to launch forth on the vast ocean of invention. For, speaking of this poet, he observes, "that, as sea marks are chiefly used by coasters, "and serve not those who have the ambition of "discoverers, that love to sail in untried seas; so he "hath rather proved a guide for those, whose "satisfied wit will not venture beyond the track of "others; than to them, who affect a new and re-"mote way of thinking; who esteem it a deficiency "and meanness of mind, to stay and depend upon "the authority of example."

"And, afterwards, he professedly makes his own merit to consist in "an endeavour to lead truth "through unfrequented and new ways, and from "the most remote shades; by representing nature, "though not in an affected, yet in an unusual "dress." These were the principles he went upon; let us now attend to the success of his endeavours.

"The METHOD of his work is defective in many respects. To instance in the two following. Observing the large compass of the antient epic, for which he saw no cause in nature, and which, he supposed, had been followed merely from a blind deference to the authority of the first model, he resolved to construct an heroic poem on the narrower, and, as he conceived, juster plan of the dramatic poems. And, because it was their practice, for the purpose of raising the passions by a close accelerated plot, and for the convenience of representation, to conclude their subject in five acts, he affects to restrain himself within the same limits. The event was, that, cutting himself off, by this means, from the opportunity of digressive ornaments, which contribute so much to the pomp of the epic poetry; and, what is more essential, from the advantage of the most gradual and circumstantiated narration, which gives an air of truth and reality to the fable, he failed in accomplishing the proper end of this poem, ADMIRATION; produced by a grandeur of design and variety of important incidents, and sustained by all the energy and minute particularity of description.

"2. It was essential to the antient epos to raise and exalt the fable by the intervention of supernatural agency. This, again, the poet mistook for the prejudice of the affected imitators of Homer, "who had "so often led them into heaven and hell, till, by "conversation with gods and ghosts, they sometimes "deprive us of those natural probabilities in story, "which are instructive to human life." Here then he would needs be original; and so, by recording only the affairs of men, hath fairly omitted a necessary part of the epic plan, and that which, of all others, had given the greatest state and magnificence to its construction. Yet here, to do him justice, one thing deserves our commendation. It had been the way of the Italian romancers, who were at that time the best poets, to run very much into prodigy and enchantment. "Not only to exceed the work, but "also the possibility of nature, they would have im-"penetrable armors, inchanted castles, invulnerable "bodies, iron men, flying horses, and a thousand "other such things, which are easily feigned by "them that dare." These conceits, he rightly saw, had too slender a foundation in the serious belief of his age to justify a relation of them. And had he only dropped these, his conduct had been without blame. But, as it is the weakness of human nature, the observation of this extreme determined him to the other, of admitting nothing, however well established in the general opinion, that was supernatural.

"And as here he did too much, so in another respect it may be observed, he did too little. The romancers, before spoken of, had carried their notions of gallantry in ordinary life, as high, as they had done those of preternatural agency, in their marvellous fictions. Yet here this original genius, who was not to be held by the shackles of superstition, suffered himself to be entrapped in the silken net of love and honour. And so hath adopted, in his draught of characters, that elevation of sentiment which a change of manners could not but dispose the reader to regard as fantastic in the Gothic romance, at the same time that he rejected what had the truest grace in the antient epic, a sober intermixture of religion.

"The execution of this poem was answerable to the general method. His SENTIMENTS are frequently forced, and so tortured by an affectation of wit, that every stanza hath the air of an epigram. And the EXPRESSION, in which he cloaths them, is so quaint and figurative, as turns his description almost into a continued riddle.

"Such was the effect of a studious affectation of originality in a writer, who, but for this misconduct, had been in the first rank of our poets. His endeavour was to keep clear of the models, in which his youth had been instructed, and which he perfectly understood. And in this indeed he succeeded. But the success lost him the possession of, what his large soul appears to have been full of, a true and permanent glory; which hath ever arisen, and can only arise, from the unambitious simplicity of nature; contemplated in her own proper form, or, by reflexion, in the faithful mirror of those very models, he so much dreaded (43)."

While we strongly feel the force of the sentiments which are here advanced, it is no small pleasure to us, that so much justice is done to Sir William Davenant's great abilities. If he had not pursued a mistaken plan, it is allowed that he would have been in the first rank of our poets.

With all its faults, the Gondibert has still its sincere and ardent admirers. The editor of the Biographia Dramatica is of opinion, that the severity of criticism to which the poem has been exposed, has arisen much more from envy than from justice; "for," says he, "though the story of it may not "perhaps be so interesting (and that too in a great "measure from its not being so well known) as "those of the Iliad and Æneid, and that the fetters "of rhyme, and still more so, those of stanza poetry, "lay it under very great restraint, yet it must be "acknowledged, even by its strongest opponents, "that there runs through the whole of it a sublimity "in the sentiments, a nobleness in the manners, a "purity in the diction, and a luxuriancy in the con-"ceptions, that would have done honour to any "writer ſucceeding articles. Sir William Davenant's works entire were publiſhed by his widow in 1673, and dedicated to his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, afterwards King James II. and,

" writer of any age or country whatſoever (44)."

Mr. Headley, whoſe premature deceaſe will be reflected upon with concern by every lover of polite literature, has diſtinguiſhed himſelf in behalf of the Gondibert. It is to this poem, he obſerves, that Davenant has to truſt for his fame, and he adds, that it particularly merits a republication. " From its total rejection," continues Mr. Headley, " of ſupernatural agency, it has afforded the critics an ample ſubject of contention. After all, it ſeems but candid to examine every work by thoſe rules only which the author preſcribed himſelf in the compoſing of it: every contrary ſtep is but trying a man of one country by the laws of another. What right have we, therefore, to be offended at not finding the critical acts paſſed by Ariſtotle originally, and re echoed by Boſſu and the French critics, rigidly obſerved, when it was the author's profeſſed intention to write without them? We may, nearly with the ſame propriety, accuſe Shakeſpeare for not adhering to the unities. It was Davenant's intention to make an experiment, and let him be heard in his own words: " If I be accuſed of innovation, or to have tranſgreſſed againſt the method of the ancients, I ſhall think myſelf ſecure in believing that a poet, who hath wrought with his own inſtruments at a new deſign, is no more anſwerable for diſobedience to predeceſſors than law-makers are liable to thoſe old laws which themſelves have repealed." In Biſhop Hurd our author has found a ſo midable accuſer. I tranſcribe the following very ſenſible paſſage from his Eſſays on Chivalry and Romance: " Pagan gods and Gothic fairies were equally out of credit when Milton wrote; he did well, therefore, to ſupply their room with angels and devils. If theſe too ſhould wear out of the popular creed (and they ſeem in a hopeful way, from the liberty ſome late critics have taken with them), I know not what other expedients the Epic poet might have recourſe to; but this I know, the pomp of verſe, the energy of deſcription, and even the fineſt moral paintings, would ſtand him in no ſtead. Without admiration (which cannot be effected but by the marvellous of celeſtial intervention, I mean the agency of ſuperior natures really exiſting, or by the illuſion of the fancy taken to be ſo), no Epic poem can be long lived"—It is to be wiſhed (though we have no demand upon him for ſuch a condeſcenſion) that the ingenious Biſhop had given us his idea of a ſubſtitute, for what he here repreſents as already exploded, as well as for what he imagines as ſoon likely to be ſo. Poetry, no doubt, in being thus deprived of theſe her magical ſupports, will loſe much of her attraction. Yet, in the caſe of Davenant (ſuppoſing him amenable to a court of criticiſm), many palliations may be urged in his defence. There can ſcarcely ſubſiſt a doubt but that, in denying himſelf the opportunity of indulging his fancy in the appendages of divine aſſiſtance, the dignity of the poem has been conſiderably diminiſhed: yet, if we recollect the ſituation he ſtood in as to time, it will appear that his conduct did not reſult from a perverſe and affected determination of deviating from rules long eſtabliſhed, and long approved, but from a ſerious and ſenſible conviction that ſuch machinery as thoſe rules ſupplied him with was no longer practicable. The ſpirit of common-ſenſe, which in his day began to ſhew itſelf, would certainly have revolted againſt heathen mythology; the Gothic ſyſtem, which the Italian ſchool preſented him with, was already hacknied and worn out, and no longer foſtered and kept alive by the reliſh for chivalry, which prevailed even when Spenſer wrote; the religion of his country afforded no inſtance that might ſerve to keep him in countenance, or juſtify an application of ſuch hallowed materials to ſo light, and perhaps ſo unworthy, a purpoſe. Theſe united objections made (if I may be allowed the expreſſion) a ſort of poetical atheiſt of Davenant, and reduced him to the neceſſity of purſuing a plan of his own, and of relying on the natural powers of his genius. With his pen in his hand, he ſeems boldly to have exclaimed, in the language of Mezentius,

" Dextra mihi Deus et telum quod miſſile libro (45)." (45) Biographical Sketches prefixed to Headley's Collection, vol. i. p. xlviii, xlix.

But the Gentleman who has moſt eminently laboured to reſcue the Gondibert from oblivion, and to recommend its beauties to the attention of the world, is Dr. Aikin. This ingenious writer has devoted a long eſſay to the ſubject; and, after having vindicated the general method of the poem, in anſwer to Dr. Hurd's objections, he proceeds to a more particular analyſis of it, the length of which ſhall not deter us from laying it before our readers; partly becauſe it conduces ſo highly to Sir William Davenant's reputation, and partly becauſe it affords ſo agreeable a ſpecimen of candid and judicious criticiſm. It will, at the ſame time, communicate to many perſons, ſuch a knowledge of the Gondibert as is wholly new to them. " I ſhould now hope," proceeds Dr. Aikin, " that the reader would ſet out with me upon a nearer inſpection of this poem, with the general idea of its being the work of an elevated genius, pregnant with a rich ſtore of free and noble ſentiment, faſhioned by an intimate commerce with the great world, and boldly purſuing an original, but not an unſkilful plan.

" The meaſure choſen for this poem is that which we now almoſt confine to elegy. This choice does not appear very judicious; for although our elegiac ſtanza poſſeſſes a ſtrength and fullneſs which renders it not unſuitable to heroic ſubjects, yet in a piece of conſiderable length, every returning meaſure muſt become tireſome from its frequent repetitions. And this is not the worſt effect of returning ſtanzas, in a long work. The neceſſity of comprizing a ſentence within the limits of the meaſure is the tyranny of Procruſtes to thought. For the ſake of a diſagreeable uniformity, expreſſion muſt conſtantly be cramped or extenuated. In general the latter expedient will be practiſed, as the eaſieſt; and thus both ſentiment and language will be enfeebled by unmeaning expletives. This, indeed, in ſome meaſure is the effect of rhyme couplets; and ſtill more of the Latin hexameter and pentameter. In our author, a redundancy of thought, running out into parentheſes, ſeems to have been produced, or at leaſt encouraged by the meaſure. But I think he has generally preſerved a force and majeſty of expreſſion.

" It would have been highly injudicious for one who has rejected all poetical machinery, to have begun his poem with the antient form of invoking a Muſe. Indeed, in all modern writers this invocation appears little better than an unmeaning ceremony, practiſed by rote from antient cuſtom; and very properly makes a part of the receipt for an epic poem humourouſly laid down after the exact model of mechanical imitation, in the Spectator. Our author, with ſimple and unaffected dignity, thus opens at once into his ſubject:

" Of all the Lombards, by their trophies known,
Who ſought fame ſoon, and had her favour long,
King ARIBERT beſt ſeem'd to fill the throne,
And bred moſt buſineſs for heroick ſong.

" This conquering monarch, we are ſoon acquainted, was bleſt with an only child, the heroine of the ſtory,

" Recorded RHODALIND! whoſe high renown
Who miſs in books not luckily have read;
Or vex'd with living beauties of their own
Have ſhunn'd the wiſe records of lovers dead.

" Deſcriptions of female beauty have engaged the powers of poets in every age, who have exhauſted all nature for imagery to heighten their painting; yet the picture has ever been extremely faint and inadequate. Our poet judiciouſly confines his deſcription and, in her dedication, ſhe tells him, that his Royal Father was not diſpleaſed with her huſband's writings, that the Queen his Mother graciouſly took him into her family, was diverted tion of Rhodalind to the qualities of her mind, contenting himſelf with general praiſes, though in the high-flown gallantry of the times, of her perſonal charms.

" Her looks like empire ſhew'd, great above pride;
Since pride ill counterfeits exceſſive height:
But nature publiſh'd what ſhe fain would hide,
Who for her deeds, not beauty, lov'd the light.

" To make her lowly mind's appearance leſs,
She us'd ſome outward greatneſs for diſguiſe;
Eſteem'd as pride the cloyſt'ral lowlineſs,
And thought them proud who even the proud deſpiſe."

" Oppreſſors big with pride, when ſhe appear'd
Bluſh'd, and believ'd their greatneſs counterfeit;
The lowly thought they them in vain had fear'd;
Found virtue harmleſs, and nought elſe ſo great.

" Her mind (ſcarce to her feeble ſex a-kin)
Did as her birth, her right to empire ſhow;
Seem'd careleſs outward when employ'd within;
Her ſpeech, like lovers watch'd, was kind and low.

" The court of Aribert could not want men of high rank and accompliſhments to pay their devotions at ſuch a ſhrine. Among theſe " OSWALD the great, and greater GONDIBERT" moved in the moſt exalted ſphere of renown. Theſe noble perſonages are characterized and contraſted with ſo maſterly a hand that it would be an injury not to tranſcribe the whole.

" In court Prince Oſwald coſtly was and gay,
Finer than near vain kings their fav'rites are!
Outſhin'd bright fav'rites on their nuptial day;
Yet were his eyes dark with ambitious care.

" Duke Gondibert was ſtill more gravely clad,
But yet his looks familiar were and clear;
As if with ill to others never ſad,
Nor tow'rds himſelf could others practice fear.

" The Prince could porpoiſe-like in tempeſts play,
And in court ſtorms on ſhipwreck'd greatneſs feed;
Not frighted with their fate when caſt away,
But to their glorious hazards durſt ſucceed.

" The Duke would laſting calms to courts aſſure,
As pleaſant gardens we defend from winds;
For he who bus'neſs would from ſtorms procure,
Soon his affairs above his manage finds.

" Oſwald in throngs the abject people ſought
With humble looks; who ſtill too late will know
They are ambition's quarry, and ſoon caught
When the aſpiring eagle ſtoops ſo low.

" The Duke did theſe by ſteady virtue gain;
Which they in action more than precept taſte;
Deeds ſhew the good, and thoſe who goodneſs feign
By ſuch even through their vizards are oûtfac't.

" Oſwald in war was worthily renown'd;
Though gay in courts, coarſely in camps could live;
Judg'd danger ſoon, and firſt was in it found;
Could toil to gain what he with eaſe did give.

" Yet toils and dangers through ambition lov'd,
Which does in war the name of virtue own:
But quits that name when from the war remov'd,
As rivers theirs when from their channels gone.

" The Duke (as reſtleſs as his fame in war)
With martial toil could Oſwald weary make,
And calmly do what he with rage did dare,
And give ſo much as he might deign to take.

" Him as their founder cities did adore;
The court he knew to ſteer in ſtorms of ſtate;
In fields a battle loſt he could reſtore,
And after force the victors to their fate.

" Of theſe great rivals, Gondibert was he whom the King had deſtined for his ſon-in-law, and the heir of his throne; and Rhodalind too, in the privacy of her own breaſt, had made the ſame choice. This is related in a manner little inferior to Shakeſpeare's famous deſcription of concealed love.

" Yet ſadly it is ſung that ſhe in ſhades
Mildly as mourning doves love's ſorrows felt;
Whilſt in her ſecret tears her freſhneſs fades,
As roſes ſilently in lymbecks melt.

" Gondibert, however, though of a nature by no means unſuſceptible of the tender paſſion, had not as yet felt it for a particular object; and Oſwald, who ſtood forth as the public ſuitor to the Princeſs, was incited by no other motive than ambition. Not Rhodalind herſelf (ſays the Poet)

" Could he affect but ſhining in her throne.

" His cauſe was powerfully pleaded with the Princeſs by his ſiſter Gartha, with whom we are next brought acquainted. A bold, full, majeſtic beauty; and a correſponding mind, high, reſtleſs, and aſpiring, are her diſtinguiſhing features. The Prince and Duke were urged on to ambitious purſuits by their reſpective armies, which, juſt returned from conqueſt, lay encamped, the one at Breſcia, and the other at Bergamo. That of Gondibert was compoſed of hardy youth whom he had ſelected from his father's camp, and educated in martial diſcipline under his own inſpection. Temperance, chaſtity, vigilance, humanity, and all the high virtues of chivalry remarkably diſtinguiſh theſe young ſoldiers from thoſe of later times. Beauty, indeed, commanded no leſs regard amongſt them than in a modern camp; but it was an object of paſſion, and not of appetite; and was the powerful engine in their education which inſpired them with noble and exalted ſentiments. This is an idea on which our author, true to the principles of chivalry, very frequently enlarges, and always with peculiar force and dignity. In the preſent inſtance it is thus finely expreſſed.

" But tho' the Duke taught rigid diſcipline,
He let them beauty thus at diſtance know;
As prieſts diſcover ſome more ſacred ſhrine,
Which none muſt touch, yet all to it may bow.

" When thus as ſuitors mourning virgins paſs
Thro' their clean camp, themſelves in form they draw,
That they with martial reverence may grace
Beauty, the ſtranger, which they ſeldom ſaw.

" They vayl'd their enſigns as it by did move,
Whilſt inward, as from native conſcience, all
Worſhip'd the poet's darling godhead, Love;
Which grave philoſophers did Nature call.

" Indeed, the influence of this paſſion in its pureſt and moſt exalted ſtate, during the courſe of education, is a ſubject that might, perhaps, ſhine as much in the hands of a moraliſt as of a poet.

" The ſoldiers of Oſwald were his father's brave veterans, in whoſe arms he had been bred. The ſtory thus opened, and our attention awakened to the expectation of important events, the firſt canto is cloſed.

diverted by, and often ſmiled upon, his endeavours; and that the latter part of his life had been ſpent in the ſtudy and labour to entertain his Majeſty and his Royal Highneſs.

" The ſecond canto introduces us to a ſolemn annual hunting, held by Duke Gondibert in commemoration of a great victory gained on this day by his grandfire. His train was adorned by many gallant and noble perſons, the friends of his family, and commanders in his army. The hunting, which is deſcribed with much poetical ſpirit, terminates in a combat. As Gondibert and his party are returning weary homeward, an antient ranger haſtily brings the tidings that Oſwald, who had lain in ambuſh with a body of choſen horſe, is advancing upon them. The Duke, rejecting all counſels of flight, prepares to receive his foes; and with an account of their principal leaders, and the order of their march, the canto concludes.

" A parley between the chiefs now ſucceeds, in which the character of each is well preſerved. Oſwald warmly accuſes his rival for uſurping his claims on the Princeſs and the kingdom. Gondibert defends himſelf with temper, and diſavows all ambitious deſigns. The other diſdains accommodation; and the conference ends in a generous agreement to decide their differences in ſingle fight.

" When every thing is prepared for the combat, Hubert, the brother of Oſwald, ſteps forth with a general challenge to the oppoſite party. This is inſtantly accepted, and ſerves for a prelude to ſo many others, that a general engagement ſeems likely to enſue; when Oſwald reproves their diſobedient ardour: and, upon Hubert's inſiſting to ſhare his fate from the rights of brotherhood, it is at length decided that three perſons of each party ſhould enter the liſts along with their generals. The duel then comes on, in the fourth canto; in which Oſwald, Hubert, Paradine and Dargonet, are ſeverally matched with Gondibert; Hurgonil, the lover of Orna, the Duke's ſiſter; and Arnold and Hugo, generous rivals in Laura. Deſcriptions of battle are ſo frequent in epic poetry that ſcarcely any circumſtances of variety are left to diverſify them. Homer and his imitators have attempted novelty in the multiplicity of their combats by every poſſible variation of weapon, poſture, and wound. They conſidered the human body with anatomical nicety; and dwelt with a ſavage pleaſure upon every idea of pain and horror that ſtudied butchery could excite. I ſhall leave it to the profeſſed admirers of antiquity to determine under what head of poetical beauty ſuch objects are to be ranged. The terrible is certainly a principal ſource of the ſublime; but a ſlaughter-houſe or a ſurgery would not ſeem proper ſtudies for a poet. D'avenant has drawn little from them. His battles are rendered intereſting chiefly by the character and ſituation of the combatants. When Arnold, the favoured lover of Laura, is ſlain by Paradine, Hugo, who had overthrown his antagoniſt, ſprings to avenge his rival, with theſe truly gallant expreſſions.

" Vain conqueror, ſaid Hugo then, return!
  Inſtead of laurel which the victor wears,
Go gather cypreſs for thy brother's urn,
  And learn of me to water it with tears.

" Thy brother loſt his life attempting mine;
  Which cannot for Lord Arnold's loſs ſuffice:
I muſt revenge, unlucky Paradine!
  The blood his death will draw from Laura's eyes.

" We rivals were in Laura; but tho' ſhe
  My griefs derided, his with ſighs approv'd,
Yet I, in love's exact integrity,
  Muſt take thy life for killing him ſhe lov'd.

" His generoſity, however, was fatal both to his foe and himſelf.

" Hubert, diſabled by a wound in his arm, is diſhonoured by receiving his life from his conqueror; upon which occaſion the poet thus beautifully apoſtrophiſes.

" O Honour, frail as life thy fellow flower!
  Cheriſh'd and watch'd and hum'rouſly eſteem'd,
Then worn for ſhort adornments of an hour;
  And is when loſt, no more than life redeem'd.

" The two chiefs are ſtill left cloſely engaging; and when Hurgonil approaches to aſſiſt his lord, he is warmly commanded to retire. At length, after many mutual wounds, Oſwald falls.

" The death of the Prince at the ſame time takes off all reſtraint from his party, and incites them to revenge. Led by the wounded Hubert, old Vaſco, and Borgio, they attack the hunters, who, beſides the fatigue of the chace, are repreſented as ſomewhat inferior in number. A furious battle, the ſubject of the fifth canto, now enſues. Gondibert ſhines forth in all the ſplendor of a hero. By his proweſs his friends are reſcued, and the oppoſite leaders overthrown in various ſeparate encounters; and by his military ſkill the brave veterans of Oſwald are defeated. The whole deſcription of the battle is warm and animated.

" In Gondibert's generous lamentation over the fallen, every heart muſt ſympathize with the following pathetic tribute to the rival lovers.

" Brave Arnold and his rival ſtrait remove,
  Where Laura ſhall beſtrew their hallow'd ground;
Protectors both, and ornaments of love;
  This ſaid, his eyes out wept his wideſt wound.

" Tell her now theſe, love's faithful ſaints, are gone
  The beauty they ador'd ſhe ought to hide;
For vainly will love's miracles be ſhown,
  Since lover's faith with theſe brave rivals dy'd.

" Say little Hugo never more ſhall mourn
  In noble numbers, her unkind diſdain;
Who now, not ſeeing beauty, feels no ſcorn;
  And wanting pleaſure, is exempt from pain.

" When ſhe with flowers Lord Arnold's grave ſhall ſtrew,
  And hears why Hugo's life was thrown away,
She on that rival's hearſe will drop a few,
  Which merits all that April gives to May.

" The Duke now draws off his remaining friends towards Bergamo: but on the journey, overcome by fatigue and loſs of blood, he falls into a deadly ſwoon. His attendants, amidſt their anxiety and confuſion upon this event, are ſurpriſed, in the ſixth canto, with the approach of a ſquadron of horſe. This, however, proves to be a friendly body, led by old Ulfin; who, after recovering the Duke by a cordial, declares himſelf to have been a page to his grandſire, and gives a noble relation of the character and exploits of his great maſter. The rumour of Oſwald's attack brought him to the relief of Gondibert; and we have a deſcription, which will be thought too much bordering upon the ludicrous, of the ſtrange confuſion among his maimed veterans, who in their haſte had ſeized upon each other's artificial limbs. This unſightly troop, with the deficiences of hands, arms, legs and eyes, can ſcarcely, with all the poet's art, be rendered a reſpectable object. Such inſtances of faulty judgment are frequent in the writings of an age which was characterized by vigour of imagination rather than correctneſs of taſte. Ulfin leads the Duke to the houſe of the ſage Aſtragon, where, with the approach of night, the canto and the firſt book conclude.

" In the beginning of the ſecond book, the poet carries us with Hurgonil and Tybalt and their noble lead, to Verona. The diſtant turrets firſt appearing, and then the great objects opening, one by one; the river, the palace, the temple, and the amphitheatre of Flaminius, form a landſcape truly noble and pictureſque. The view of the temple gives occaſion occaſion to one of thoſe elevated religious ſentiments which dignify this poem.

" This to ſoothe heaven the bloody Clephes built;
As if heaven's king ſo ſoft and eaſy were,
So meanly hous'd in heaven, and kind to guilt,
That he would be a tyrant's tenant here.

" We have then a lively deſcription of a city morning; with the various and uncertain rumours of the late event, among the people. The reſt of the canto is employed in a debate, rather tedious, though intermixed with fine ſentiments, concerning the propriety of granting funeral rites to thoſe who had periſhed in the quarrel.

" The progreſs of the fatal news is traced in the next canto. Aribert appears ſitting in council in all the regal dignity. Tybalt relates the ſtory. The King in a majeſtic ſpeech complains of the toils and cares of empire, and predicts the baneful conſequences likely to enſue. A more intereſting ſcene is then diſcloſed, in which Tybalt declares the melancholy events of the combat to Rhodalind and the other Ladies of the court. Great art is ſhown in the delicate ambiguity by which they are prepared to receive the tidings. Laura is overpowered by her loſs; and calling on Arnold's name, is conveyed away by her female attendants. This tender ſcene of ſorrow is finely contraſted by the abrupt entrance of Gartha, in all the wild pomp of mingled rage and grief.

" No ſooner was the pity'd Laura gone,
But Oſwald's ſiſter, Gartha the renown'd,
Enters as if the world was overthrown,
Or in the tears of the afflicted drown'd.

" Unconquer'd as her beauty was her mind,
Which wanted not a ſpark of Oſwald's fire;
Ambition lov'd but ne'er to love was kind;
Vex'd thrones did more than quiet ſhades deſire.

" Her garments now in looſe neglect ſhe wore,
As ſuited to her wild diſhevell'd hair.

" In the fury of her paſſion ſhe breaks out into execrations againſt the innocent.

" Blaſted be all your beauties, Rhodalind!
Till you a ſhame and terror be to fight;
Unwing'd be Love, and ſlow as he is blind,
Who with your looks poiſon'd my brother's ſight!

" At length ſhe mounts her chariot, and flies with the wings of revenge to the veteran camp at Breſcia. The terror impreſſed on the people by her haſty departure is imaged with great ſublimity.

" She ſeem'd their city's Genius as ſhe paſs'd,
Who, by their ſins expell'd, would ne'er return.

" The third canto brings us to Breſcia, where Hubert's arrival with the dead body of Oſwald excites every emotion of ſurprize, grief and fury in the breaſts of the brave veterans. They ſpend the night in this ſtorm of contending paſſions; and at day-break aſſemble round the tent of Hubert, who by a noble harangue gives additional fire to their revenge. They inſtantly arm, and demand to be led to Bergamo; when Gartha arrives. She turns their vengeance againſt the court, where ſhe repreſents the triumph of Gondibert's faction, and the diſhonour caſt upon their own. The rage diſcovered in her countenance, overpowering the ſymptoms of grief, is painted with amazing grandeur in the following ſimile:

" The Sun did thus to threat'ned nature ſhow
His anger red, whilſt guilt look'd pale in all,
When clouds of floods did hang about his brow;
And then ſhrunk back to let that anger fall.

" This tempeſt is, however, allayed in the next canto by the arrival of the wiſe Hermegild; who, though grown aged in war and politics, is poſſeſſed with a youthful paſſion for Gartha. He ſolemnly binds his ſervices to their party, for the reward of Gartha's love; but perſuades them to ſubmit to more cautious and pacific meaſures. Gartha returns with him to the court; and the funeral of Oſwald with Roman rites, " Which yet the world's laſt law had not forbid," is deſcribed in the remaining part of the canto.

" From ſcenes of rage and tumult the poet then leads us to the quiet ſhades of philoſophy in the houſe of Aſtragon. This change is not better calculated for the reader's relief, than for a diſplay of the richneſs and elevation of the writer's mind. That the friend of Hobbes ſhould deſpiſe the learned lumber of the ſchools will not be thought extraordinary; but that he ſhould diſtinctly mark out ſuch plans of acquiring knowledge as have ſince been purſued with the greateſt ſucceſs, may well be deemed a remarkable proof of high and comprehenſive genius. In Aſtragon's domain is a retired building, upon which is written in large letters, GREAT NATURE'S OFFICE. Here ſit certain venerable ſages, ſtiled Nature's Regiſters, buſied in recording what is brought them by a throng called their Intelligencers. Theſe men are diverſly employed in exploring the haunts of beaſts, of birds, and of fiſhes, and collecting obſervations of their manners, their prey, their increaſe, and every circumſtance of their œconomy. Near this place is NATURE'S NURSERY, ſtocked with every ſpecies of plants, of which the ſeveral properties and virtues are diligently examined. Is it not ſtriking to find in the houſe of Aſtragon ſo exact a model of the ſchool of Linnæus?

" We are next led to the CABINET OF DEATH; a receptacle for ſkeletons and anatomical curioſities of every kind: and from thence, by a pleaſing analogy, to the library, or, as it is termed, the MONUMENT OF BANISH'D MINDS. The feelings of his gueſts on entering this room are thus deſcribed;

" Where, when they thought they ſaw in well-fought books
Th' aſſembled ſouls of all that men held wiſe,
It bred ſuch awful rev'rence in their looks
As if they ſaw the bury'd writers riſe.

" The poet then goes through a particular ſurvey of the authors, diſtinguiſhed into their ſeveral periods, countries, and profeſſions; in which he exhibits a great extent of learning, and, much more to his honour, a ſound and liberal judgment of what is truly valuable in learning. Of this, his account of the polemic divines will be thought no unfavourable ſpecimen.

" About this ſacred little book did ſtand
Unwieldy volumes, and in number great;
And long it was ſince any reader's hand
Had reach'd them from their unfrequented ſeat:

" For a deep duſt (which time does ſoftly ſhed,
Where only time does come) their covers bear;
On which grave ſpiders ſtreets of webs had ſpread,
Subtle, and ſlight, as the grave writers were.

" In theſe heaven's holy fire does vainly burn,
Nor warms, nor lights, but is in ſparkles ſpent;
Where froward authors with diſputes have torn
The garment ſeamleſs as the firmament.

" If the ſubjects of this canto appear more noble and elevated than thoſe which uſually employ the epiſodes of heroic poetry, that of the enſuing one muſt ſtrike with ſtill ſuperior dignity. Having acquainted us with the philoſophy of his admired ſage, the poet now, by a beautiful kind of allegory, inſtructs us in his religion. Aſtragon had dedicated three temples, to PRAYER, to PENITENCE, and to PRAISE. The Temple of Prayer is deſcribed as a building quite plain, open, and without bells; ſince nothing ſhould tempt or ſummon to an office to which our own wants invite us. The duty of Penitence being a ſeverity unpleaſing to nature, its temple is contrived, by its ſolemn and uncommon appearance, to catch the ſenſe. It is a vaſt building of black marble, hung with black, and furniſhed with that

" dim religious light" which poets have ſo finely employed to excite kindred ideas of gloom and melancholy: but none, I think, have painted it with ſuch ſtrength of colouring as our author:

" Black curtains hide the glaſs; whilſt from on high
A winking lamp ſtill threatens all the room,
As if the lazy flame juſt now would die:
Such will the ſun's laſt light appear at doom.

" A tolling bell calls to the temple; and every other circumſtance belonging to it is imagined with great propriety and beauty.

" But the poet's greateſt exertions are reſerved for his favourite temple of Praiſe. A general ſhout of joy is the ſummons to it. The building in its materials and architecture is gay and ſplendid beyond the moſt ſumptuous palace. The front is adorned with figures of all kinds of muſical inſtruments; all, as he moſt beautifully expreſſes it,

" That joy did e'er invent, or breath inſpir'd,
Or flying fingers touch'd into a voice.

" The ſtatues without, the pictures within, the decorations, and the choir of worſhippers, are all ſuited with nice judgment, and deſcribed with genuine poetry. This diſtinguiſhed canto concludes with theſe noble ſtanzas, the ſum and moral, as it were, of the whole.

" Praiſe is devotion fit for mighty minds;
The diff'ring world's agreeing ſacrifice;
Where heaven divided faiths united finds:
But Prayer in various diſcord upward flies.

" For Prayer the ocean is, where diverſly
Men ſteer their courſe, each to a ſev'ral coaſt;
Where all our intereſts ſo diſcordant be
That half beg winds by which the reſt are loſt.

" By Penitence when we ourſelves forſake,
'Tis but in wiſe deſign on pitcous heav'n;
In Praiſe we nobly give what God may take,
And are without a beggar's bluſh forgiv'n.

" Its utmoſt force, like powder's, is unknown;
And tho' weak Kings exceſs of Praiſe may fear,
Yet when 'tis here, like powder, dangerous grown,
Heav'ns vault receives what would the palace tear.

" The laſt thought will be termed, in this cold age, a conceit; and ſo may every thing that diſtinguiſhes wit and poetry from plain ſenſe and proſe.

" The wonders of the houſe of Aſtragon are not yet exhauſted.

" To Aſtragon heaven for ſucceſſion gave
One only pledge, and BIRTHA was her name.

" This maid, her father's humble diſciple and aſſiſtant, educated in the boſom of rural ſimplicity, is rendered a more charming object than even the renowned Rhodalind upon her throne.

" Courts ſhe ne'er ſaw, yet courts could have undone
With untaught looks and an unpractis'd heart;
Her nets the moſt prepar'd could never ſhun,
For Nature ſpread them in the ſcorn of Art.

" But I check my deſire of copying more from this exquiſitely pleaſing picture. My intention is to excite curioſity, not to gratify it. I hope I have already done enough for that purpoſe; and ſince the reſt of this unfiniſhed ſtory may be comprized in a ſhort compaſs, I ſhall proceed, with but few interruptions, to conclude a paper already ſwelled to an unexpected bulk.

" That the unpractiſed Birtha ſhould entertain an unreſiſted paſſion for the nobleſt of his ſex; and that Gondibert, whoſe want of ambition alone had ſecured him from the charms of Rhodalind, ſhould bow to thoſe of his lovely hoſteſs and handmaid, will be thought a very natural turn in the ſtory; upon which, however, the reader may foreſee the moſt intereſting events depending. The progreſs of their love, though ſcarcely known to themſelves, is ſoon diſcovered by the ſage Aſtragon. This is expreſſed by the poet with a very fine turn of a common thought.

" When all theſe ſymptoms he obſerv'd, he knows
From Alga which is rooted deep in ſeas,
To the high Cedar that on mountains grows,
No ſov'reign herb is found for their diſeaſe.

" The remainder of this poem, conſiſting of a third book written during the author's impriſonment, is compoſed of ſeveral detached ſcenes, in which the main plot lies ripening for future action. Rivals are raiſed in Birtha. Flattering advances from the court, and more open declarations of love from Rhodalind, are in vain employed to aſſail the conſtancy of Gondibert. Various conflicts of paſſion ariſe, and intereſting ſituations, well imagined, and painted in lively colours. Much is given, as in the former parts, to the introduction of elevated ſentiment; with one example of which I ſhall finiſh my quotations. Several well-born youths are placed about the perſon of Gondibert as his pages, whoſe education conſiſts of the following great leſſons from their lord.

" But with the early ſun he roſe, and taught
Theſe youths by growing Virtue to grow great;
Shew'd greatneſs is without it blindly ſought,
A deſperate charge which ends in baſe retreat.

" He taught them Shame, the ſudden ſenſe of ill;
Shame, nature's haſty conſcience, which forbids
Weak inclination ere it grows to will,
Or ſtays raſh will before it grows to deeds.

" He taught them Honour, Virtue's baſhfulneſs;
A fort ſo yieldleſs that it fears to treat;
Like power it grows to nothing, growing leſs;
Honour, the moral conſcience of the great.

" He taught them Kindneſs; ſoul's civility,
In which, nor courts, nor cities have a part;
For theirs is faſhion, this from falſhood free,
Where love and pleaſure know no luſt nor art.

" And Love he taught; the ſoul's ſtol'n viſit made
Tho' froward age watch hard, and law forbid;
Her walks no ſpy has trac'd, nor mountain ſtaid;
Her friendſhip's cauſe is as the loadſtone hid.

" He taught them love of Toil; Toil which does keep Obſtructions from the mind, and quench the blood;
Eaſe but belongs to us like ſleep, and ſleep,
Like Opium, is our med'cine, not our food.

" The plot is at length involved in ſo many intricate and apparently unſurmountable difficulties, that it is ſcarcely poſſible to conceive a ſatisfactory termination. Perhaps the poet was ſenſible of a want of power to extricate himſelf, and choſe thus to ſubmit to a voluntary bankruptcy of invention, rather than hazard his reputation by going farther. In his poſtſcript, indeed, he excuſes himſelf on account of ſickneſs and approaching diſſolution. However diſappointed we may be by his abrupt departure from ſcenes which he has filled with confuſion, we ought not to forget the pleaſures already received from them. " If (ſays he to his reader, with more than the ſpirit of a dying man) thou art one of thoſe who has been warmed with poetic fire, I reverence thee as my judge." From ſuch a judicature, this NOBLE FRAGMENT, would, I doubt not, acquire for him what the critic laments his having loſt, " the poſſeſſion of that true and permanent glory of which his large ſoul appears to have been full (46)."

Whilſt the preceding remarks will fully convince our readers, that there is a merit in the Gondibert, of which many of them had not, perhaps, the leaſt apprehenſion, we muſt, at the ſame time, declare our opinion, that nothing can ever render it a popular poem. Dr. Aikin acknowledges, that it is defective in the execution. It is but too obviouſly apparent, he ſays, that Sir William Davenant's ſentiments are frequently far fetched and affected, and his expreſſion quaint and obſcure; and that theſe faults, together with the want of harmony in verſification, will ſufficiently account for the neglect into which the work is fallen, though intereſting in its ſtory, and thick-ſown with beauties (47).

(47) Ibid. p. 152.

But though the Gondibert will ſtill continue to be generally neglected, this does not detract from the value of Dr. Aikin's criticiſm. Diſquiſitions of ſuch a kind are eminently uſeful. They preſerve the reputation of conſiderable men from ſinking wholly into oblivion, and they occaſion their works to be ſtudied by a few choice ſpirits, who are above being carried away by the torrent of literary faſhion. D'AVENANT (CHARLES), the eldeſt ſon of Sir William Davenant, was born ſome time in the year 1656 (a), and received the firſt tincture of letters at the grammar ſchool of Cheame, in the county of Surry, under the care of Mr. George Aldrich, of Cambridge (b). He gave very early proofs of an active and ſprightly genius; and, though it muſt have been a great misfortune to him to loſe, as he did, his father, when ſcarcely twelve years of age, yet care was taken to ſend him to Oxford to compleat his ſtudies, where he became a Fellow-Commoner of Baliol-College in Midſummer Term 1671, but left that Univerſity without taking a degree (c). The firſt proof which the public received of his parts was a dramatic compoſition, written when he was about nineteen years of age, and which was received with great kindneſs by a very polite audience, and frequently acted afterwards with juſt applauſe (d) [A]. He had a conſiderable ſhare in the theatre in right of his father, which, probably, induced him to turn his thoughts ſo early to the ſtage; yet he was not long detained either by that, or by the ſucceſs of his play, in the flowery road of Poetry. On the contrary, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Civil Law, in which he had the degree of Doctor conferred upon him by the Univerſity of Cambridge (e). He was elected, with James St. Amand, Eſq; to repreſent the borough of St. Ives in Cornwall, in the firſt Parliament of King James II. which was ſummoned to meet May 19th, 1685 (f); and, about the ſame time, he was jointly empowered, with the Maſter of the Revels, to inſpect all plays, to preſerve the decorum of the Stage, by preventing any thing that might have a tendency to immorality from appearing thereon (g). He was alſo appointed a Commiſſioner of the Exciſe (h), and continued in that employment for nearly ſix years, that is, from 1683 to 1689; during which ſpace that branch of the revenue was managed with great advantage to the Crown, as well as with great honour and fidelity by ſuch as were intruſted with it, as he demonſtrated to the public by comparing their conduct, and the conſequences of it, with thoſe of their ſucceſſors; againſt which account, though there were ſome cavils raiſed, yet the facts contained therein could not be contradicted (i) [B]. His thorough acquaintance with [A] And frequently acted afterwards with juſt applauſe.] This ſingle dramatick performance of our author has the following title:

I. CIRCE, a Tragedy, acted at his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York's theatre, Lond. 1677, 4*to*.

After the death of Sir William Davenant, thoſe miſchiefs, to which the theatre became expoſed in his life-time, began to threaten it's deſtruction. For the two companies, vying with each other, that of the Duke rather choſe to make their court to the town by rich dreſſes, beautiful ſcenes, ſurprizing machinery, and other decorations of that ſort, than play to thinner houſes than uſual, which ſerved only to heighten that falſe taſte, that has been always the bane of dramatick entertainments. To the introduction of theſe, this new piece was ſo far accommodated, that, notwithſtanding it's title, Mr. Langbaine ſays juſtly, that it was conſidered rather as an Opera; yet the ſubject ſuiting very well with the deſign, and the verſes being written with great eaſe and ſpirit, it was with all theſe helps generally, if not univerſally, admired (1). The reader muſt obſerve, that it was not printed till two years after it was firſt acted, upon which occaſion Mr. Dryden wrote a Prologue, and the Earl of Rocheſter an Epilogue, both beautiful pieces in their kind. In the former there was this fine apology for the author's youth and inexperience (2).

He may grow up to write, and you to judge.

[B] Yet the facts therein could not be contradicted.] It may be reaſonably believed, though, at this diſtance of time, it cannot be poſitively affirmed, that this gentleman had ſome leſſer employment in the Exciſe, before he was advanced to the rank of a Commiſſioner. It is to one of his adverſaries that we are indebted for this circumſtance, that Mr. Davenant came to the board at Midſummer 1683, when this part of the revenue, which for many years had been let to farm, came again into the hands of the Crown, and was delegated to ſix Commiſſioners (3). The hiſtory of their management, as given by Dr. Davenant himſelf, is what we have referred to in the text, and a ſmall part of which we ſhall tranſcribe here, from which the reader will diſcern, that, when this gentleman undertook to give the publick his ſentiments as to the management of the revenue, he was not either an ignorant or an impertinent pretender, but one who perfectly underſtood the matter which he promiſed to make plain, and pointed out the only method for correcting the errors of the adminiſtration that will ever be found practicable, viz. that of detecting the faults in particular departments, ſhewing whence they ariſe, and how they may be amended. Let the author now ſpeak for himſelf, and tell us how that commiſſion was executed while he remained a member (4).

with the laws and conſtitution of the kingdom, joined to his great ſkill in figures, and his happineſs in applying that ſkill according to the principles advanced by Sir William Petty, for the perfecting Political Arithmetic, enabled him to enter deeply into the management of affairs, and procured him great ſucceſs as a political writer (k). In all his pieces he reaſons entirely upon Revolution principles, and pays the higheſt compliments to the perſonal virtues, and excellent abilities, of the Prince then upon the throne; notwithſtanding which ſuch as oppoſed him made no ſcruple of diſputing his principles, and of maintaining, that his real view was to ſubvert the government, though he pretended to ſupport it by expoſing the errors of the Miniſtry (l). His performances in this kind, during the reign of King William, were very numerous; and, as they met with high approbation then, ſo the importance of the ſubjects of which they treat, and the ſingular and ſolid learning they contain, make them very much eſteemed and valued even at this day. We ſhall give the reader the correcteſt catalogue we can of them in the notes [C]. It was in one ‘ of thoſe under them, and till they were more maſ-

‘ ters of their buſineſs; and by degrees, and with ‘ great caution, they weeded out ſuch unqualified, ‘ corrupt, or negligent officers, as had been partially ‘ brought in during the former management, which ‘ was ſupine enough towards the latter end. And
‘ whereas the method of keeping the ſtock-books,
‘ and way of charging the people, were different al-
‘ moſt in every collection, they ſettled one uniform
‘ method through the whole kingdom, taking that ‘ form for a pattern which had been made uſe of
‘ with moſt ſucceſs in the beſt managed collections,
‘ which were Yorkſhire, Wales, and the four northern ‘ counties.

‘ To ſee which method put in execution, and to ‘ ſee ſuch other directions performed as the Com-‘ miſſioners ſhould afterwards give, they appointed
‘ four general Riders, and eight general Surveyors.
‘ But as a check above all, and which was ind ed
‘ the life of their whole affair, the Commiſſioners
‘ themſelves made frequent circuits round the king‘ dom, viewing every particular officer in his re-
‘ ſpective diviſion, without which the inferior officers ‘ would have run into ſloth, and the ſuperior into ‘ corruption. And in theſe circuits they could ob-
‘ ſerve who were remiſs, who diligent, who deſerved
‘ advancement, who wanted removing; and here
‘ they ſuited each man's diſtrict to his capacity, and,
‘ if their officers were corrupt, here they got true
‘ information of their proceedings.

‘ But theſe Commiſſioners had done little good ‘ abroad with their inſpection, if the officers had not ‘ been ſenſible, that they were overlooked by per-‘ ſons ſkilful in the matter, and able to hit a fault;
‘ for that Commiſſioner who rides abroad not fully ‘ poſſeſſed of his buſineſs, ſhall be hourly impoſed
‘ upon by the inferior officers, and leave things in a ‘ worſe order than he found them. They rarely
‘ made any addition of officers to increaſe the King's ‘ charge, but upon their own view in theſe circuits,
‘ and upon a full conviction that ſuch increaſe of ‘ expence would turn to the King's account.

‘ They took care to employ reſponſible men for ‘ their Collectors, by which means their accounts
‘ have been made up with very little ſupers upon ‘ any officer. In ſix years time they had got toge‘ ther twelve hundred Gaugers, active and ſkilful,
‘ and ſuch a ſet of men, as perhaps, no Prince had ‘ ever a better employed in his revenue. And as to ‘ the commiſſion itſelf, it was firſt compoſed of per-‘ ſons who all of them, ſome way or other, had been ‘ before converſant in the exciſe, and who agreed
‘ very well together; for in ſix years of that manage‘ ment, not one thing was ever put to the vote
‘ among them.

‘ They were generally perſons not above their ‘ employments, and who had no other buſineſs but
‘ the King's to follow; and they had a large ſalary
‘ which put them beyond corruption. Their manage‘ ment was impartial: no man was turned out to let
‘ in another, but upon ſtrong proof, and the report
‘ of a Commiſſioner or General Officer upon the ſpot.
‘ So that he who was ſkilful and diligent, looked ‘ upon himſelf as in for life, for which reaſon they ‘ were ſerved heartily and with affection.

‘ Their management was uncorrupt; no place was ‘ ſold, or ſuffered to be ſold, under them; by which ‘ they could pick and chooſe the beſt, and were en‘ tirely maſters of their inferior officers. They were ‘ ſteady and conſtant in their proceedings, not giving
‘ out general orders one week and contradicting them
‘ the next.

‘ They did not vex the people any where with un-
‘ reaſonable fines; and knowing the revenue in ſome ‘ meaſure to be precarious, they were not ſevere in ‘ London in exacting arrears, for fear that if they ‘ ſhould bring any diſtreſs and trouble upon the Lon‘ don brewery, it would occaſion the making ill
‘ drink, and ſo drive the people to brew themſelves,
‘ which would deſtroy the duty.

‘ Theſe Commiſſioners did believe, that their ‘ ſkill, fidelity, and diligence, would always re‘ commend them to any government, and keep them
‘ in their employments: they therefore quitted their ‘ private buſineſs and profeſſions, to devote them-
‘ ſelves wholly to the King's ſervice, managing his ‘ revenue with the ſame care, affection, and fruga-‘ lity, as the father of a family would uſe in the ‘ ordering his own affairs, which occaſioned my Lord
‘ Rocheſter, (no incompetent judge in thoſe mat‘ ters) at his leaving the Treaſury, to take parti‘ cular notice to the late King, how well that branch
‘ had been conducted.

‘ But, after all, the ſucceſs with which this ‘ management was attended, is chiefly to be attri‘ buted to the wiſdom and ſteady conduct of thoſe ‘ noble perſons, who, while they governed at the ‘ head of the Treaſury, in their ſeveral turns, did ‘ more at Whitehall towards keeping this branch in ‘ order, than was done in Broad-ſtreet. When the ‘ principal officers and Commiſſioners of every reve‘ nue were in a manner of their chooſing, and under ‘ their direction, they took care that the King ſhould
‘ be well and diligently ſerved, and the publick ‘ taſted the benefit of that great power which was ‘ truſted with them. They had notice how each ‘ perſon attended or underſtood his buſineſs; they ‘ called every month to know what Commiſſioners
‘ were abroad ſurveying in the country; they looked ‘ into all tranſactions weekly, and took an exact ac‘ count every quarter how the duty proceeded; and,
‘ in ſhort, the ſtrict eye which the Treaſury kept
‘ over the Commiſſioners, rendered them watchful
‘ over their inferior officers; all which together made
‘ the revenue flouriſh.’

To this high character of theſe Commiſſioners, he adds, by way of contraſt, a very different one of thoſe who ſucceeded them, and in reſpect to this he was very vigorouſly oppoſed by one, who had ſome particular reaſons for vindicating their conduct whom the Doctor had expoſed; but even this writer (5) does not at all contradict what had been advanced in reference to the behaviour of the firſt ſet of Commiſſioners while they were in office.

[C] The correcteſt catalogue we can of them in the notes.] A certain writer tells us, that Dr. Davenant having laid wagers that the army of the allies would not ſucceed in Flanders, and particularly that they would not be able to take Namur (6), his loſing them provoked him to draw his pen againſt the government, ſo that, if he is believed, private pique, and particular prejudices, were the ſource of this gentleman's publick ſpirit. His books however are penned in a manner very different from this, and ſeem to ſpeak ſpeak the writer very heartily deſirous that the war then carried on ſhould be attended with ſucceſs, and the power of France humbled, without exhauſting the ſtrength of this nation. Such is the apparent view of his firſt political work.

II. An Eſſay upon Ways and Means of ſupplying the War, Lond. 1695, 8*vo*.

In this treatiſe he diſcovered his great capacity in the art of computation, and with much induſtry and pains pointed out the means of judging truly of the nature of funds, upon which important ſubjects he wrote with ſo much ſtrength and perſpicuity, as gained him great reputation, and ſufficiently recommended to the publick whatever pieces came abroad by the author of The Eſſay on Ways and Means, which was the method Dr. Davenant took to diſtinguiſh moſt of his ſucceeding writings, as well as if he had put his name to them, which however, for ſome prudential reaſons, he declined.

III. An Eſſay on the Eaſt India Trade, London, 1697, 8*vo*.

This, which was no more than a pamphlet, wore the form of a letter to the moſt honourable John Lord Marquis of Normanby, afterwards Duke of Buckinghamſhire. In it the author gives a ſhort and clear view of the importance of trade in general, and afterwards enters very fairly and freely into the nature of the trade to the Eaſt Indies, which he confeſſes to be detrimental to the inhabitants of Europe in general, but ſhews, that it may be advantageous to ſome particular nations, that it is ſo to England, and that the monopoly of this trade in the hands of the Dutch, might be worth to them ſix millions ſterling annually. He likewiſe gives his reaſons, why the prohibitions then intended of Eaſt India and Perſia wrought ſilks, would be deſtructive to that trade in general, and hazard it's being utterly loſt to the kingdom.

IV. Diſcourſes on the Publick Revenues, and of the Trade of England; by the author of the Eſſay on Ways and Means. Part I. To which is added, A Diſcourſe upon improving the Revenue of the State of Athens, written originally in Greek by Xenophon, and now made Engliſh from the Original, with ſome Hiſtorical Notes; by another hand. Lond. 1698, 8*vo*.

In this piece, the author undertakes to diſcover his ſenſe upon the following very important topicks, viz. Of the uſe of political arithmetick, in all conſiderations about the revenue and trade. On credit, and the means and methods by which it may be reſtored. On the management of the King's revenues; Whether to farm the revenues may not, in this juncture, be moſt for the publick ſervice? On the publick debts and engagements.

The Diſcourſe on the Revenue of the State of Athens, was written by the famous Walter Moyle, Eſq; and addreſſed by him to Dr. Davenant, in which addreſs there occurs a paſſage, which ſhews that there were ſome thoughts of ſending over our author in quality of Director-General to the Eaſt Indies, and is alſo a clear teſtimony, what that great man's notions were in reference to the real intentions, as well as great importance, of our author's writings. Speaking of what might be expected upon the concluſion of a peace with France, he ſays (7), 'Trade 'being of ſuch mighty conſequence to the intereſt of 'the nation, will, we hope, meet with due encouragement and protection from our laws, and 'will be ſettled under the ableſt management and 'the wiſeſt regulation. Theſe branches of our commerce, which have been impaired or loſt by the 'pyratick war, and the fatal interruption of our 'navigation, may be retrieved by the peace; and 'other trades, and particularly that with France, 'which the negligence, or the miſtaken counſels of 'the laſt reigns, had ſettled upon a foot ſo deſtructive 'to our intereſt, may be eſtabliſhed to our advantage 'in a new treaty of commerce. The great trade to 'the Eaſt Indies, with ſome few regulations, might 'be eſtabliſhed upon a bottom more conſiſtent with 'the manufactures of England; but in all appear'ance this is not to be compaſſed, unleſs ſome pub'lick ſpirited man (*), with a maſterly genius, be 'placed at the head of our affairs in India; and tho' 'we, who are his friends, are loth to loſe him, 'twere 'to be wiſhed for the good of the kingdom, that the 'gentleman whom common fame, and the voice of 'the world, have pointed out as the ableſt man for 'ſuch a ſtation, would employ his excellent judg'ment and talents that way, in the execution of ſo 'noble and uſeful a deſign. The general intereſt of 'a nation ought to be the care of particular men, 'the main bent of their ſtudies, and the chief pur'ſuit of their enquiries: every man ought to ſet his 'helping hand to ſuch a work, and your own gene'rous labours upon this ſubject have ſet an excellent 'pattern to the reſt of the world.'

(*) Dr. Davenant himſelf.

V. Diſcourſes on the Publick Revenues, and on the trade of England, which more immediately treat of the foreign traffick of this kingdom. By the author of the Eſſay on Ways and Means. Part II. Lond. 1698, 8*vo*.

In this excellent work, the author has undertaken to explain four very important points, ſo as to render them perfectly intelligible even to common underſtandings. The firſt is the nature of foreign trade, in which he not only ſhews that it is really beneficial to this kingdom, but how it comes to be ſo, and what are the proper methods of enquiring, whether foreign trade is beneficial or not within any given period whatever. The ſecond point is as to the care and protection of trade, in which a multitude of curious points are incidentally illuſtrated. The third point he labours, is that of the plantation trade, and in reference to this there are more uſeful obſervations advanced, and more important facts laid down, than are to be met with in the ſame compaſs in any book publiſhed in our language. The advantages and diſadvantages which may be derived from the Eaſt India trade, or which it may be expoſed to, is our author's topick in his fourth diſcourſe, at the beginning of which he gives the following account of what he would have underſtood to be the ſcope and intention of all his writings (8). 'The author's aim is 'to deliver things plainly, without the diſguiſe of 'hard words and terms, which rubbiſh being re'moved, the precious ore will ſooner appear that is 'to be found in ſtudies of this nature. His ends 'are compaſſed if he can ſet out intricate matters in 'an eaſy manner, hoping thereby to induce the young 'Nobility and Gentry of the kingdom to take a 'pleaſure in theſe ſort of contemplations, and he 'wiſhes this preſent performance did in any degree 'anſwer the deſire he has of ſerving the publick.

'Tis a great delight to him to obſerve, that many 'of our young Nobility and Gentry have expreſſed 'an inclination to inform themſelves of the ſtate of 'England, and that learning begins to be more in 'faſhion than of late years, people being not aſhamed 'now of underſtanding Greek and Latin. Nothing 'did more help to advance the Roman greatneſs, 'than that their youth were bred up to an early 'knowledge of their country's buſineſs, to which 'they attained by progreſſive ſteps, through ſeveral 'offices of the State, wherein they gained the ex'perience that fitted them at laſt for the magiſtracies 'of chiefeſt truſt and importance. They qualified 'themſelves for the publick ſervice, by ſeaſoning 'betimes their underſtandings with the love of let'ters; for, in thoſe days, whoever pretended to 'intermeddle in matters of government, did firſt 'cultivate his mind with wiſdom and the precepts of 'Philoſophy, by which afterwards he might ſteer 'his actions, giving to the ſearch into uſeful arts or 'ſublimer ſtudies thoſe hours, which, in this age, 'are conſumed in riots and vain pleaſures.

'adminiſtration. And in national aſſemblies, it has 'been generally obſerved, that the young men are 'leaſt infected with corruption, and that they would 'always follow truth, but for the falſe lights which 'crafty guides ſet up with a purpoſe to miſlead them, 'for, while we are young, we are either aſhamed, 'or have not leiſure, to play the knave; but we 'come to it as age and diſcretion grow upon us.

'The writer's aim is to ſtir up the youth of the 'kingdom to bend their thoughts to the ſtudy of 'trade and the publick revenues, that, being maſters 'of the general notions of trade thereunto relating, 'they may not be miſled by crafty and intereſted 'Merchants, or by ambitious and deſigning Politi-'cians. When the youth of a nation have well in-'formed their own reaſon, they follow her dictates, 'deliberating well and wiſely for their King and 'country, without being hurried to and fro by the 'whirlwind of a prevailing faction.'

In anſwer to this performance, more eſpecially to what is advanced therein concerning the exciſe, there was publiſhed a pamphlet under the following title:

Remarks upon ſome wrong Computations and Concluſions, contained in a late tract, intituled, Diſcourſes on the Publick Revenues, and on the trade of England, in a Letter to Mr. D. S. London, 1698, 8*vo*.

VI. An Eſſay upon the Probable Methods of making the People Gainers in the Ballance of Trade. By the author of the Eſſay on Ways and Means. London, 1699, 8*vo*.

In this diſcourſe he inſiſts upon the following heads, viz. Of the people of England. Of the land of England, and it's product. Of our payments to the publick, and in what manner the balance of trade may be thereby affected. That a country cannot increaſe in wealth and power but by private men doing their duty to the publick, and but by a ſteady courſe of honeſty and wiſdom, in ſuch as are truſted with the adminiſtration of affairs.

VII. A Diſcourſe upon GRANTS and RESUMPTIONS, ſhewing how our anceſtors have proceeded with ſuch Miniſters, as have procured to themſelves Grants of the Crown Revenue, and that the Forfeited Eſtates ought to be applied towards the Payment of Publick Debts. By the author of the Eſſay on Ways and Means. Lond. 1700, 8*vo*.

In anſwer to this came out a very large and accurate work intituled,

JUS REGIUM: or, The King's Right to grant Forfeitures and other Revenues of the Crown, fully ſet forth, and traced from the beginning. His Majeſty vindicated as to his Promiſe, concerning his Diſpoſal of the Forfeited Eſtates. The manifold Hardſhips of the Reſumption, and the little Advantage we ſhall reap by it, plainly demonſtrated. Lond. 1701, 8*vo*.

VIII. Eſſays upon the Ballance of Power; the Right of making War, Peace, and Alliances; Univerſal Monarchy. To which is added an Appendix, containing the Records referred to in the ſecond Eſſay. London, 1701, 8*vo*.

A very large and full anſwer to this work was publiſhed, under the title of Animadverſions on a late factious book, intituled, Eſſays upon the Ballance of Power, &c. with a Letter containing a Cenſure upon the ſaid book, wherein the King, the Miniſtry, and the Church of England, are cleared from the malicious Aſperſions caſt upon them by the Enemies of this Government. Lond. 1701, 8*vo*.

(9) P. 5. The author of this pamphlet tells us (9), that Dr. Davenant made himſelf conſpicuous, and ſecured a great party in the nation, by his early quarrel to the government, upon account of the mal-adminiſtration of affairs, which he would perſwade the world to be the reſult of his love to his country, when we all know his ſpleen has no other cauſe, than his having no more a ſhare in the management of one of the branches of the revenue.

IX. The true picture of a Modern Whig, in two Parts. Lond. 1701, 1702, 8*vo*.

There is nothing but general report, founded upon the likeneſs of the ſtile and other circumſtantial evidence, to prove that this bitter pamphlet fell from the pen of our author, and, if it did, he muſt be allowed to have been the greateſt maſter of invective that ever wrote in our language.

[D] From one of the Houſes in Convocation.] Our author, who is ſaid by his enemies to have been a very warm party-man himſelf, and blamed for calculating moſt of his writings for the ſervice of a party, makes it however the chief point in moſt of his books, and in that eſpecially which drew upon him this misfortune, to ſhew, that no country can be happy while party ſubſiſts in it, and that government can never be well adminiſtered while in the hands of a party. To ſhew that this was the caſe at that time, more eſpecially in the Church, he delivers himſelf in the following extraordinary flow of reſentment (10):

(10) P. 39, 40.

'As to religion, ſays he, 'tis notorious that many of thoſe lately in play, have uſed their utmoſt endeavours to diſcountenance all Revealed Religion. They were more enraged at the Church party for believing in the Apoſtles Creed, than from the Tory principles ſome of them had advanced. Nothing but the ſubverſion of all divine worſhip, could make way for that immorality which they intended to put in practice. All ſort of Divines forbid the arts and ways by which they purpoſed to thrive; they were therefore to unſettle men in their opinions about religious matters, by which they hoped to prepare the minds, eſpecially of the vulgar, to have different thoughts of vice and virtue than what they had heretofore entertained, which if they could have compaſſed, they did not doubt to be well eſteemed of, as being the reverſe of what honeſt and virtuous men ought to be, and acting quite oppoſite to what all religions have enjoined. They would have been ſafe indeed, and it would cover all their crimes, if nothing could be thought foul, treacherous, or diſhoneſt, by which a man was to reap advantage, and if the people could have been once brought to think every thing good which they ſaw to proſper. Upon theſe grounds they have done their utmoſt to turn all religion to a jeſt. Do not we all know, that, in the midſt of their prophane mirth, a modeſt Chriſtian durſt hardly put in a word in favour of the ſecond perſon of the Trinity, without expoſing himſelf to laughter? To hear 'em talk ſometimes, one would imagine they believed a true Chriſtian could not be a friend to the government. Good God! what a ſtrange mixture of men have we lately ſeen upon the ſtage? irreligious Phanaticks, and arbitrary Republicans! Are not a great many of us able to point out to ſeveral perſons, whom nothing has recommended to places of the higheſt truſt, and often to rich BENEFICES and DIGNITIES, but the open enmity which they have, almoſt from their cradles, profeſſed to the divinity of Chriſt.'

What was done upon this will beſt appear, from tranſcribing part of the Journal of the Upper Houſe of Convocation (11).

Seſſio x. Die Sabbati 22 Martii.

The Moſt Reverend and Right Reverend Fathers being met in the Jeruſalem Chamber, made their accuſtomed prayers to Almighty God. Which being done, the ſaid Moſt Reverend produced a certain printed book, intituled, Eſſays upon the Ballance of Power, and after the reading of a certain paragraph in the fortieth page of the ſaid book, the Preſident and his Suffragans agreed, That the following paper ſhould be fixed over ſeveral doors in Weſtminſter-abbey.

March 22, 1700.

Whereas this day a book intituled Eſſays upon I. The Ballance of Power. II. The Right of making War, Peace, and Alliances. III. Univerſal Monarchy, &c. was brought into the Jeruſalem Chamber, where his Grace the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the reſt of Suffragan Biſhops of his province, were aſſembled in Convocation:

It is not at all ſtrange that one, who wrote upon ſuch topics, and with ſo much freedom as he did, who cenſured boldly the meaſures he diſapproved, and had ſometimes the good fortune to find his ſentiments eſpouſed by the repreſentatives of the nation, ſhould feel the reſentments of men in power, or be expoſed to very harſh treatment from thoſe who endeavoured to refute him, in order to gain their favour (n). But a different behaviour might be expected from ſuch as undertake to write hiſtory, and who ought therefore to be very ſecure of their facts, before they deliver them as ſuch to the public and to poſterity: yet a certain writer bears very hard upon Dr. Davenant, for his conduct as a Member of Parliament in the reign of King William; tells us, that his circumſtances were ſuch as would have prevented him from having a ſeat after the act for qualifications took place; that the narrowneſs of them made it more than ſuſpected he was bribed by Count Tallard, the French Miniſter; and inſtances, in a particular vote, where Dr. Davenant himſelf acknowledged he had given it againſt his conſcience (o). Yet we find our author complaining in his books of being ſhut out of active life, and having no other way to benefit his country but by his pen (p), which would have been very ſtrange language, if, at the ſame time, he had ſitten in Parliament; but the truth of the matter is, that he did not obtain a ſeat in the reign of King William till the year 1698, when he was elected, with Francis Stonehouſe, Eſq; for the borough of Great Bedwin, as he was afterwards in the year 1700 (q); at which time alſo he wrote as warmly againſt France as any man; ſo that if the French Miniſter really allowed him a penſion, he beſtowed his money very ill; and the improbability of the fact makes better evidence neceſſary to prove it, than the bare aſſertion of an author very apt to be angry, and to believe, and ſay, any thing of thoſe with whom he is angry. This is farther certain, that, in 1704, Dr. Davenant wrote a book, to ſhew the neceſſity of peace at home while a neceſſary war was carried on abroad; which he dedicated to Queen Anne (r), and which was ſuppoſed to be written at the deſire of Lord Halifax; though the Hiſtorian before-mentioned tells us, that he deſpiſed the author, and would never have any confidence in him (s). This drew upon him the reſentment of that party by whom he had been formerly eſteemed, and who beſtowed upon him as ill language, or rather worſe, than he had received from his former opponents (t). He was afterwards appointed Inſpector-General of the Exports and Imports (u), in which employment he gave a very high teſtimony of his abilities; ſo that, to ſpeak with impartiality, he ought to be eſteemed a perſon who ſerved his country faithfully when in office, and uſefully when out. As for his remaining works they will be mentioned in the notes [E]. It is preſumed, that the care taken in repreſenting fairly and fully the perform-

X. Eſſays upon Peace at home and War abroad, in two parts, by Charles Davenant, L. L. D. Lond. 1704, 8*vo*.

Whatever the motives might be which induced our author to compoſe and publiſh this piece, it is very certain that it is one of the wiſeſt and weightieſt that ever fell from his pen. That he was not aſhamed in any degree of this undertaking, appears from his putting his name to the book: and that he was as far from taking ſhame to himſelf on the ſcore of his former writings or behaviour, appears very clearly from the following paragraphs in his Dedication to the Queen, which are therefore highly deſerving the reader's notice.

'That for many years there have been parties in this kingdom is too evident, but 'twas what the beſt Patriots all along deplored, though formerly the miſchief was hardly to be avoided: endeavours to keep up a great land force in times of peace, neglect of trade, general profuſion, the ſpoils ſome had made upon the publick, and their alienating crown lands to an immenſe value both here and in Ireland, could not but provoke them who were to feel the weight of preſent taxes and of future debts.

In a free nation ſuch conduct will ever inflame the minds of men, and excite all true lovers of their country to exert their utmoſt ſtrength in it's reſcue. Theſe conteſts, to promote good government, and to carry on a bad one, divided the realm. The corruptions of the age were attacked with virtuous courage at firſt by thin ſquadrons, whoſe numbers increaſed from time to time, till at laſt they were ſtrong enough to make ſuch a ſtand, as prevented univerſal ruin. In the mean while, miſmanagement was ſupported with more warmth than perhaps was either juſt or decent. And theſe ſtruggles were no ſmall interruptions to your immediate predeceſſor in his counſels, and in his buſineſs of the war.

And 'tis no wonder the face of the waters is not yet quite ſmooth: after a high ſtorm there will remain an agitation of the waves for many hours. Ambition may be ſtill at work, and ſome may yet be graſping at power, which they hope to compaſs by the aids and voices of their faction: but God has enriched your princely heart with ſuch prudence, as ſoon diſcerns what moſt conduces to the happineſs of the nations over which your ſceptre is extended.'

able, and advantageous Trade to Britain. Lond. 1709, fol. in three parts.

There is indeed no name to any of theſe treatiſes, but it was very well known at the time they were publiſhed by whom they were written, and therefore in a large collection of tracts, in the hands of a perſon perfectly well acquainted with literary hiſtory, they had this title given them (12), Dr. Davenant's Reflections on the Trade to Africa, 3 parts, 1709. It muſt be acknowledged, that, excluſively of the reaſonings and arguments advanced in this performance, and which have been frequently copied ſince; there are abundance of material facts, and curious pieces of Hiſtory, which will render them always admired, and valued by thoſe who are deſirous of underſtanding the ſubject thoroughly, which they are intended to explain.

The laſt of theſe Reports is dated from the Inſpector-General's office, Dec. 10, 1711 (13), and the deſign of both is, to give a general account of the trade of the kingdom from 1663 to 1710. This was the laſt work of our author, and contains in it a collection of facts of ineſtimable value to ſuch as are willing to diſtinguiſh between rumour, or common opinion, and the true ſtate of things, in reference to the commerce of Great Britain with her neighbours.

 [The firſt part of Dr. Davenant's diſcourſes on the public Revenues and the Trade of England, was ſmartly attacked, in a piece, entitled, "Remarks upon ſome wrong computations and concluſions contained in a late tract, &c." To this publication, which appeared in 1698, was prefixed the following motto, taken from the Doctor himſelf: "Miſerable is that country where the men of buſi-"neſs do not reckon right."

Dr. Davenant's "true picture of a modern Whig" was carried on in a dialogue between Mr. Whiglove and Mr. Double, two under Spur-Leathers to the late miniſtry. The ſame deſign was afterwards proſecuted by him in another work, of which no notice has been taken by any of his former Biographers. It appeared in 1710, in two volumes, octavo, and is entitled, "New Dialogues upon the preſent poſ-"ture of Affairs, the Species of Money, national "Debts, public Revenues, Bank and Eaſt India "Company, and the Trade now carried on between "France and Holland. By the author of the "Eſſay on Ways and Means." The nature of this performance, as well as the circumſtance mentioned in the title page, aſcertains it to be Dr. Davenant's. It is evidently a continuation of the true picture of a modern Whig. Tom Double, metamorphoſed into Sir Thomas Double, compoſes a part of the Dramatis Perſonæ, and the attack upon the Whig party is purſued. The work is alſo full of that public information by which Davenant's writings are ſo much diſtinguiſhed.

For the preceding intelligence, and the ſubſequent character of Dr. Davenant's productions, the preſent Editor of the Biographia is endebted to his ingenious friend, Sir John Sinclair, Bart. who has amply ſhewn, by his own valuable performances, that no one is better capable of judging upon the ſubject. "Davenant," ſays Sir John, "is certainly a moſt "valuable political author; and conſidering that the "modern ſyſtem of politicks, founded on a ſpirit of "commerce, on public credit, on paper circulation, "and on ſkill in finance, was then in a manner in "its infancy, he undoubtedly was a writer whoſe "progreſs was more advanced than could have been "expected at that time. It appears from his works, "that he had acceſs to official information, from "which he derived many advantages. He ſeems, "however, to have depended too much upon politi-"cal Arithmetic, or the ſtrength of figures, which "ought only to be reſorted to, when the fact itſelf "cannot be aſcertained, being only a ſuccedaneum "when better evidence cannot be procured. He "was unfortunately, alſo, a party writer, and ſaw "every thing in the manner the beſt calculated to "promote the views and purpoſes of his political "friends at the time. Every thing they did was "right, whilſt every action of their enemies was "ill-intended and ruinous. He poſſeſſed a very "conſiderable command of language, and is ſome-"times too prolix; but on the whole there are cer-"tainly very few that can rival him as a political "author."

In 1771, was publiſhed, in five volumes, octavo, "The political and commercial works of that cele-"brated writer Charles Davenant, L. L. D. relat-"ing to the Trade and Revenue of England, the "Plantation Trade, the Eaſt-India Trade, and the "African Trade. Collected and reviſed by Sir "Charles Whitworth, Member of Parliament. To "which is annexed, a copious Index." This publication has greatly contributed to the diffuſion and utility of the Doctor's writings.

D'AVENANT (WILLIAM), younger brother to the former, and fourth ſon to Sir William Davenant; was educated at Magdalen Hall, in the Univerſity of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, July 19th, 1677 (a). He tranſlated into Engliſh from the French a book, intituled, Animadverſions upon the famous Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, written by the celebrated Mr. la Mothe le Vayer (b), who was Tutor to the French King Louis XIII; which was very well received. He took the degree of Maſter of Arts July 5th, 1680 (c), and about the ſame time entering into holy orders, was preſented to a living in the county of Surrey, by his patron Robert Wymondſole, of Putney, Eſq; with whom he travelled into France; and in the ſummer of the year 1681, as he was diverting himſelf by ſwimming in a river near Paris, he was unfortunately drowned in the ſight of his Pupil, to the great regret of all who knew him, having added to great natural parts, by an aſſiduous application to ſtudy, as much ſound learning and true knowledge as could be expected in a perſon ſo young.

 [DAVIES (SIR JOHN), an eminent Lawyer, Poet, and Political Writer, was born at Chiſgrove, in the pariſh of Tiſbury, in Wiltſhire (a). He was the third ſon of John Davies, who is ſaid by Anthony Wood to have been a wealthy Tanner; but in the books, which record the admiſſion of the ſon into the Society of the Middle Temple, it is ſaid that the father was "late of New Inn, Gentleman (b)." Young Davies, in 1585, when he was was in the fifteenth year of his age, was entered a Commoner of Queen's College, Oxford. Here he had the advantage of a good Tutor, and being poſſeſſed of excellent natural abilities, and applying himſelf cloſely to his ſtudies, he made a conſiderable proficiency in literature. At the beginning of the year 1588, he removed to the Middle Temple; but he appears to have returned occaſionally to Oxford; for in 1590, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c). At the Temple, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law; but he was more diſtinguiſhed by his abilities, than by the regularity of his manners. "He in-"terrupted," it is ſaid, "the quiet of the Inn, by miſdemeanours, for which he was "fined, and by diſorders, for which he was removed from commons (d)." However, in July, 1595, he was called to the bar; but in February, 1597-8, he was expelled the Society of the Middle Temple. Wood ſays, "that he being a high-ſpirited young man, "did, upon ſome little provocation, or punctilio, baſtinado Richard Martin, afterwards "Recorder of London [A], in the Common-hall of the Middle Temple, while he was at "dinner. For which act being forthwith expelled, he retired for a time in private, lived "in Oxon in the condition of a ſojourner, and followed his ſtudies, though he wore a "cloak (e)." Davies's miſconduct appears to have retarded his progreſs at the bar, and involved him in difficulties which led him to ſerious reflexion [B]. But he ſeems never to have been inattentive to literature. Beſides the ſtudy of the law, he alſo particularly applied himſelf to poetry, and wrote, under the title of "Hymns of Aſtrea," twenty-ſix acroſtics, in honour of Queen Elizabeth. Theſe pieces contain much poetry, and much flattery, and are greatly ſuperior to the generality of compoſitions of this kind. His poetical talents now excited the attention of the Court, and when Sir Robert Cecil was to make an entertainment for the Queen, Mr. Davies was ſummoned to furniſh his ſhare of gratulations (f). But in 1599, he publiſhed, in 4*to*. his Noſce Teipſum, or Poem on the Immortality of the Soul [C], a performance of conſiderable merit, and which completely eſtabliſhed his poetical reputation.

Wood ſays, that 'there was 'no perſon in his time more celebrated for ingenuity 'than Richard Martin, none more admired by Selden, Serjeant Hoſkins, Ben Johnſon, &c. than he; 'the laſt of which dedicated his comedy to him, 'called the Poetaſter. King James was much delighted with his facetiouſneſs, and had ſo great 'reſpect for him, that he commended him to the 'citizens of London to be their Recorder (2).' He publiſhed ſome poems, and ſeveral of his ſpeeches in Parliament were alſo printed. He died in 1618, when he had not been elected to the office of Recorder much more than a month (3).

Of Human Knowledge. II. Of the Soul of Man, and the Immortality thereof.' A third edition was printed, in folio, in 1688; and a fourth was publiſhed, in 8vo. in 1697, by N. Tate, who ſays in the preface, 'The author of this poem merits a laſting honour; 'for, as he was a moſt eloquent lawyer, ſo, in the 'compoſition of this piece, we admire him for a 'good poet and exact philoſopher. 'Tis not rhyming that makes a poet, but the true and impartial 'repreſenting of virtue and vice, ſo as to inſtruct 'mankind in matters of greateſt importance. And 'this obſervation has been made of our countrymen, 'that Sir John Suckling wrote in the moſt courtly 'and gentleman-like ſtyle; Waller in the moſt ſweet 'and flowing numbers; Denham with the moſt 'accurate judgment and correctneſs; Cowley with 'pleaſing ſoftneſs, and plenty of imagination: 'None ever uttered more divine thoughts than Mr. 'Herbert; none more philoſophical than Sir John 'Davies.'

'And are the caſements which admit moſt light.

Mr. Davies's attachment to the muſes did not prevent the continuance of his application to the ſtudies and buſineſs of his profeſſion; and in Trinity term, 1601, by the intereſt of Lord Elleſmere, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, after having made proper ſubmiſſions, he was again reſtored to his Chamber in the Middle Temple (g). He was alſo choſen a Member of the Houſe of Commons, for Corfe-caſtle in Dorſetſhire, in the laſt Parliament of Elizabeth, which aſſembled on the 27th of October, in the ſame year. He appears to have been an active and uſeful Member of Parliament, and a ſupporter of the privileges of the Houſe. He particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the great debate about [D] monopo-

(5) Poetical Works of Sir John Davies, p. 46—49. edit. 1773.

It is obſervable that Sir John Davies, in this poem, introduces ſome arguments grounded on the doctrine of original ſin, and which he illuſtrates and ſupports from the principles of the law of England (6). In the courſe of the poem he has given the different arguments in defence of the immateriality and immortality of the ſoul, and adorned and illuſtrated thoſe arguments with a great variety of poetical images. Of the ſtrong deſire and expectation of future happineſs implanted in the human mind, he thus expreſſes himſelf:

(6) Ibid. p. 35, 36.

' Doubtleſs, all ſouls have a ſurviving thought,
' Therefore of death we think with quiet mind;
' But if we think of being turn'd to nought,
' A trembling horror in our ſouls we find.'—

' Hence ſprings that univerſal ſtrong deſire,
' Which all men have of immortality:
' Not ſome few ſpirits unto this thought aſpire,
' But all men's minds in this united be.

' Then this deſire of nature is not vain,
' She covets not impoſſibilities;
' Fond thoughts may fall into ſome idle brain,
' But one aſſent of all, is ever wiſe.

' From hence that gen'ral care and ſtudy ſprings,
' That launching, and progreſſion of the mind,
' Which all men have ſo much of future things,
' That they no joy do in the preſent find.

' From this deſire, that main deſire proceeds,
' Which all men have ſurviving fame to gain,
' By tombs, by books, by memorable deeds;
' For ſhe that this deſires, doth ſtill remain.

' Hence, laſtly, ſprings care of poſterities,
' For things their kind would everlaſting make:
' Hence is it, that old men do plant young trees,
' The fruit whereof another age ſhall take.

' If we theſe rules unto ourſelves apply,
' And view them by reflection of the mind,
' All theſe true notes of immortality,
' In our heart's tables we ſhall written find (7).'

(7) Ibid. p. 76, 79, 80.

In the compoſition of this poem, it is obſerved, in the preface to Tate's edition, that "our author is "beholden to none but himſelf." It has, however, been conjectured, and the ſuppoſition ſeems not improbable, that Sir John Davies derived ſome hints for his work from the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of Philip de Mornay's treatiſe on the truth of the Chriſtian religion, of which an Engliſh tranſlation was printed at London in 4to. in 1587. It is ſaid in a note to the edition of the Noſce Teipſum, printed with Sir John Davies's other poetical works in 1773, that this poem is, "without diſpute, except Spenſer's "Faery Queen, the beſt that was written in Queen "Elizabeth's, or even in King James the Firſt's "time."

[D] Debate about Monopolies.] Queen Elizabeth had granted to her ſervants and courtiers a great number of patents for various monopolies, which were found to be very pernicious to the nation, and which were in conſequence ſtrongly and juſtly oppoſed. A petition from the parliament was preſented to the Queen, complaining of theſe patents; but ſhe perſiſted in defending her monopoliſts againſt the people. A bill was, therefore, brought into the Houſe of Commons, for the abolition of all theſe monopolies; and as the petition to the Queen had been unſucceſsful, a law was properly inſiſted on, as the only certain expedient for correcting theſe abuſes. But the courtiers maintained, that this matter regarded the prerogative, and that the Commons could not hope for ſucceſs in any other way but by petition to her Majeſty (8).

lies, inſiſting, that the Houſe ought to proceed againſt them by Bill, and not by Petition [E].

On the death of Queen Elizabeth, Mr. Davies accompanied Lord Hunſdon into Scotland, when that Nobleman went thither to congratulate King James, on his acceſſion to the Throne of England [F]. Being introduced into his Majeſty's preſence, the King inquired of Lord Hunſdon the names of the Gentlemen who were with him; and his Lordſhip naming among them John Davies, who ſtood behind, the King immediately aſked, whether he was Noſce Teipſum, alluding to the title of his poem on the immortality of the ſoul. Lord Hunſdon informed him that he was the ſame; upon which the King, as Wood informs us, "graciouſly embraced him, and thenceforward had ſo great a favour for him, "that ſoon after he made him his Solicitor, and then his Attorney-General in Ireland (b)."

(b) Ath. Oxon. vol. i. fol. 506.

It was in 1603, that Mr. Davies was ſent as Solicitor-General to Ireland, and his appointment to the office of Attorney-General took place ſoon after. During his reſidence in that kingdom, he travelled through all the provinces of it, and made himſelf very accurately acquainted with the ſtate of the people and of the country. He was alſo appointed one of the Juſtices of Aſſize [G], and appears to have diſcharged the duties of his office

[E] By bill, and not by petition.] 'Mr. Davies 'moved the Houſe firſt, That he for his part thought 'the proceeding by bill to be moſt convenient; for 'the precedent in the 50 Edvardi 3. warranteth the 'ſame: And, therefore, (ſaid he) let us do generouſly and bravely, like parliament men; and 'ourſelves ſend for them, and their patents, and 'cancel them before their faces; arraign them, as 'in times paſt, at the bar, and ſend them to the 'Tower; there to remain, until they have made a 'good fine to the Queen, and made ſome part of 'reſtitution to ſome of the pooreſt that have been 'oppreſſed by them.(9).'

(9) Townſhend's Hiſt. Collections of the Four laſt Parliaments of Queen Elizabeth, p. 244.

When the Queen found, that the debates grew high in the Houſe of Commons concerning the monopolies, and that the diſcontents of the people concerning them were very great, ſhe ſent for the Speaker, and deſired him to inform the Houſe, that ſhe would immediately cancel theſe obnoxious patents. She alſo iſſued a proclamation againſt the monopolies that were complained of; upon which a deputation was ſent to return her Majeſty thanks. Elizabeth made a ſpeech on this occaſion to the Speaker, and the members who accompanied him, in which were the following paſſages: 'I do aſſure you, that there is 'no Prince that loveth his ſubjects better, or whoſe 'love can countervail our love. There is no jewel, 'be it of never ſo rich a price, which I prefer before 'this jewel, I mean your love; for I do more eſteem 'it than any treaſure or riches.'—'Of myſelf I muſt 'ſay this, I never was any greedy, ſcraping graſper, 'nor a ſtrait faſt-holding Prince, nor yet a waſter; 'my heart was never ſet on worldly goods, but only 'for my ſubjects good. What you do beſtow on me, 'I will not hoard it up, but receive it to beſtow on 'you again. Yea, mine own properties I count 'yours, to be expended for your good.'—'Since I 'was Queen, yet did I never put my pen to any 'grant, but that upon pretext and ſemblance made 'unto me, that it was both good and beneficial to 'the ſubjects in general, though a private profit to 'ſome of my antient ſervants who had deſerved well. 'But the contrary being found by experience, I am 'exceedingly beholden to ſuch ſubjects as would 'move the ſame at firſt. And I am not ſo ſimple to 'ſuppoſe, but that there be ſome of the lower Houſe, 'whom theſe grievances never touched; and for 'them I think they ſpeak out of zeal to their countries, and not out of ſpleen or malevolent affection, 'as being parties grieved; and I take it exceeding 'grateful from them, becauſe it gives us to know 'that no reſpects or intereſts had moved them, other 'than the minds they bear to ſuffer no diminution of 'our honour, and our ſubjects love unto us. The 'zeal of which affection tending to eaſe my people, 'and knit their hearts unto me, I embrace with a 'princely care: far above all earthly treaſure I 'eſteem my people's love, more than which I deſire 'not to merit (10).'

(10) D'Ewes, ut ſupra, p. 659.

[F] To congratulate King James, on his acceſſion, &c.] While Davies was in Scotland on this occaſion, he received a letter from Mr. Francis Bacon, afterwards the celebrated Viſcount of St. Alban's, in which is the following paſſage:

"I commend myſelf to your love, and the well "uſing my name; as well in repreſſing and anſwering for me, if there be any biting or nibbling at "it in that place, as in imprinting a good conceit "and opinion of me, chiefly in the King, of whoſe "favour I make myſelf comfortable aſſurance, as "otherwiſe in that court: and not only ſo, but "generally to perform to me all the good offices "which the vivacity of your wit can ſuggeſt to "your mind, to be performed to one, with whoſe "affection you have ſo great ſympathy, and in whoſe "fortune you have ſo great intereſt. So deſiring "you to be good to concealed poets *, I continue

"Your aſſured friend,

"Fr. Bacon (11)."

(*) Bacon ſeems to ſpeak of himſelf here as a concealed poet, as having made ſome poetical attempts which he did not think proper openly to avow.

(11) Lord Bacon's Works, vol. iii. p. 222. edit. 4*to*. 1765.

There appears at this time to have been a conſiderable intimacy between Bacon and Davies; and a letter is ſtill preſerved from the former to the latter, written when Davies was Attorney-General in Ireland, in which Bacon ſays, 'I would be glad to hear 'often from you, and to be adverti ſed how things 'paſs, whereby to have ſome occaſion to think ſome 'good thought; though I can do little, at leaſt it 'will be a continuance in the exerciſe of our friendſhip, which on my part remaineth encreaſed, by 'that I hear of your ſervice, and the good reſpect I 'find towards myſelf (12).' It is obſerved by the writer of Davies's life, that "this correſpondence "continued while Davies could be of uſe to Bacon; "but it ceaſed when Bacon had advanced before "Davies in the rank of their profeſſion. Such is "the inſtability of friendſhips between men who run "for the ſame prize; whether for the diſtinctions "of literature, or for the honours of life (13)."

(13) Id. ibid.

[G] He was alſo appointed one of the juſtices of aſſize.] Sir John Davies himſelf informs us, that in Ireland, ſoon after the acceſſion of King James I. 'By a general act of ſtate, called the Act of Obli'vion, publiſhed by proclamation under the Great 'Seal, all offences againſt the Crown, and all par'ticular treſpaſſes between ſubject and ſubject, done 'at any time before his Majeſty's reign, were (to all 'ſuch as would come in to the juſtices of aſſize by a 'certain day, and claim the benefit of this act) par'doned, remitted, and utterly extinguiſhed, never 'to be revived or called in queſtion. And by the 'ſame proclamation, all the Iriſh (who, for the moſt 'part, in former times, were left under the tyranny 'of their lords and chieftains, and had no defence 'or juſtice from the Crown) were received into his 'Majeſty's immediate protection. This bred ſuch 'comfort and ſecurity in the hearts of all men, as 'thereupon enſued the calmeſt and moſt univerſal 'peace that ever was ſeen in Ireland. The public 'peace being thus eſtabliſhed, the ſtate proceeded 'next to eſtabliſh the public juſtice in every part of 'the realm: and to that end, Sir George Cary (who 'was a prudent governor, and a juſt, and made a 'fair entry into the right way of reforming this 'kingdom) did, in the firſt year of his Majeſty's 'reign, make the firſt Sheriffs that ever were made 'in Tyrone and Tyrconnel; and, ſhortly after, ſent office with great diligence and ability. He returned, however, occaſionally to England; and, in Trinity term, 1606, was called to the degree of Serjeant at Law, and on the 11th of February, 1607, received the honour of knighthood (i). The ſame year the Lord-Deputy of Ireland, having determined to make a judicial progreſs through the counties of Monaghan, Fermannagh, and Cavan, joined Sir John Davies with the Chief Juſtice, as one of the Judges of aſſize, for performing this unwelcome ſervice (k). An elaborate account of this circuit [H] was drawn up by Sir John Davies, and addreſſed to Robert Cecil, Earl of Saliſbury, who had contributed to his advancement in Ireland.

[H] An elaborate account of this circuit, &c.] This was firſt printed, from a copy among the Harleian MSS. in the edition of his Hiſtorical Tracts, publiſhed in 1786. The following title is prefixed to it: "A letter from Sir John Davies, Knight, At-"torney-General of Ireland, to Robert Earl of "Saliſbury, touching the ſtate of Monaghan, Fer-"mannagh, and Cavan; wherein is a diſcourſe con-"cerning the Corbes and Irenaghs of Ireland." In this letter, after having given ſome account of the condition in which the counties of Monaghan, Fermannagh, and Cavan were, Sir John Davies ſays, 'I thought it not impertinent to ſhew unto your 'Lordſhip how unſettled the poſſeſſion of thoſe 'counties were, before my Lord-Deputy began his 'journey; that it may appear, how needful it was, 'that the Lord-Deputy ſhould deſcend in perſon to 'viſit thoſe counties, whereby he might have op-'portunity to diſcover and underſtand the true and 'particular ſtate, both of the poſſeſſions and poſſeſ-'ſors thereof, before he gave warrants for paſſing 'the ſame by letters patent unto any; and thereby 'prevent that error, which had formerly been com-'mitted in paſſing all Tyrone to one, and Tyrconnel 'to another, and other large territories to Odogherly 'and Randal M'Sorley, without any reſpect of the 'King's poor ſubjects who inhabit and hold the lands 'under them; whereby the patentees are made little 'Kings, or rather tyrants over them: inſomuch as 'they now being wooed and prayed by the ſtate, 'cannot yet be drawn to make freeholders for the 'ſervice of the commonwealth, which, before the 'paſſing of their patents, they would gladly and 'humbly have yielded unto. The ſtate, therefore, 'of the three counties before named, ſtanding in 'ſuch terms as I have before expreſſed; my Lord-'Deputy, accompanied with the Lord-Chancellor, 'the Lord Chief-Juſtice, Sir Oliver Lambert, and 'Sir Garret Moore, and being alſo waited upon by 'myſelf, who was for this ſervice joined in commiſ-'ſion of aſſize and gaol delivery with the Chief Juſ-'tice, began his journey the nineteenth day of July 'laſt, being Saturday, and lodged that night and 'the next at the Abbey of Mellifont, Sir Garret 'Moore's houſe. On Monday night his Lordſhip 'camped in the field, upon the borders of Ferney, 'which is the inheritance of the Earl of Eſſex; and 'albeit we were to paſs through the waſteſt and 'wildeſt parts of all the North, yet we had only for 'our guard ſix or ſeven ſcore foot, and fifty or three 'ſcore horſe, which is an argument of a good time, 'and of a confident deputy. For in former times '(when the ſtate enjoyed the beſt peace and ſecurity) 'no Lord-Deputy did ever venture himſelf into 'thoſe parts without an army of eight hundred or 'one thouſand men. The third night after our 'departure from Mellifont, we came to the town of 'Monaghan, which doth not deſerve the name of a 'good village, conſiſting of divers ſcattered cabins, 'or cottages, whereof the moſt part are poſſeſſed by 'the caſt ſoldiers of that garriſon. In the north-'moſt part thereof there is a little fort, which is 'kept by the foot company of Sir Edward Blaney, 'who is ſeneſchal or governor of that county by 'patent. In the midſt of this village, there is a 'foundation of a new caſtle, which being raiſed ten 'or twelve feet from the ground, and ſo left and 'neglected for the ſpace of almoſt two years, is now 'ready to fall into ruin again; albeit his Majeſty's 'charge in building hath already been twelve hun-'dred pounds at leaſt. My Lord-Deputy was as 'much diſpleaſed at the ſight thereof, as the chief 'Lords of the country are pleaſed and comforted 'therewith; becauſe if it were erected and finiſhed 'in that form as was intended, it would at all times 'be a bridle unto their inſolency: for the M'Ma-'hounes undoubtedly are the proudeſt and moſt bar-'barous ſept among the Iriſh; and do ever ſooneſt 'repine, and kick, and ſpurn at the Engliſh govern-'ment. My Lord-Deputy having pitched his tents 'about a quarter of a mile from the town, did pre-'ſently diſtinguiſh the buſineſs that was to be done; 'the determining of matters of the crown, and the 'hearing of perſonal petitions touching debt and 'treſpaſs, he left wholly to the juſtices of the aſſize 'and gaol delivery; and reſerved only to himſelf, 'and the Lord Chancellor, the conſideration of ſuch 'petitions as ſhould be made unto him, touching 'the lands and poſſeſſions of that country (15).'

(15) Hiſtorical Tracts, p. 239, 240, 241.

Sir John Davies alſo takes notice in this letter of a commiſſion which had been ſent from England, one object of which was, "to take order for the re-"edifying and the repairing of the churches, and "for the placing of ſufficient incumbents therein."— 'This point of that commiſſion,' ſays he, 'was not 'before time put in execution any where, albeit it 'was ſundry times moved at the council table, that 'ſomewhat might be done therein: but my Lords 'the Biſhops that ſit at the board, being not very 'well pleaſed that laymen ſhould intermeddle with 'eccleſiaſtical matters, did ever anſwer that motion 'in this manner: Let us alone with that buſineſs; 'take you no care for that; we will ſee it effected, 'we warrant you. Notwithſtanding there hath been 'ſo little care taken, as that the greateſt part of the 'churches within the pale lie ſtill in their ruins; ſo 'as the common people (whereof many without 'doubt would conform themſelves) have no place to 'reſort unto, where they may hear divine ſervice. 'This conſideration moved us to inquire of the ſtate 'of the church in theſe unreformed counties. The 'inquiſition preſented unto us in this county was in 'Latin, becauſe the principal jurors were vicars and 'clerks. It appeared, that the churches for the 'moſt part are utterly waſte; that the King is patron 'of all; and that the incumbents are Popiſh prieſts, 'inſtituted by Biſhops authorized from Rome; yet 'many of them, like other old prieſts of Queen 'Mary's time, in England, ready to yield to con-'formity (16).'

(16) Ibid. p. 251, 252.

In this letter is alſo the following paſſage: 'As 'for the vicarages, they are ſo poorly endowed, as 'ten of them being united will ſcarce ſuffice to 'maintain an honeſt miniſter. For the churches, 'they are for the moſt part in ruins; ſuch as were 'preſented to be in reparation, are covered only 'with thatch. But the incumbents, both parſons 'and vicars, did appear to be ſuch poor, ragged, 'ignorant creatures (for we ſaw many of them in 'the camp), as we could not eſteem any of them 'worthy of the meaneſt of thoſe livings, albeit many 'of them are not worth above 40s. per annum. In 1708, he was sent to England, together with the Chief Justice, in order to represent to King James the effects which the establishment of public peace, and the several judicial progresses throughout Ireland, had produced in that kingdom. On this occasion he was highly applauded for his public services, and was particularly well received by the Chancellor, Lord Ellesmere, and by the Earl of Salisbury (l). After his return to Ireland, he continued to be very active in the measures adopted for the civilization of Ireland; and in 1610, wrote a letter to the Earl of Salisbury [I], containing an account of the measures that had been adopted for establishing a new plantation, or colony, in Ulster [K]. In 1612, he published, in 4to. "A Discovery of the true causes why Ireland was "never entirely subdued [L], and brought under obedience of the Crown of England, "until 'country doth lie within the diocese of Kilmore, 'whose Bishop (Robert Draper) was and is parson of 'Trym, in Meath, which is the best parsonage in 'all the kingdom; and is a man of this country 'birth, worth well nigh 400l. a year. He doth 'live now in these parts, where he hath two bishop-'rics; but there is no divine service or sermon to 'be heard within either of his dioceses. His Lord-'ship might have saved us this labour of inquiry, 'touching matters ecclesiastical, if he had been as 'careful to see the churches repaired, and supplied 'with good incumbents, as he is diligent in visiting 'his barbarous clergy, to make benefit out of their 'insufficiency, according to the proverb, which is 'common in the mouth of one of our great Bishops 'here: That an Irish priest is better than a milch (17) Ibid. p. 274, 275. 'cow (17).'

[I] A letter to the Earl of Salisbury.] This was first published, from a manuscript in the British Museum, in the edition of his Historical Tracts, printed in 1786.

[K] A new plantation, or colony, in Ulster.] It is observed by the writer of Davies's life, that 'this 'salutary work had been long in contemplation, 'lest, as Bacon expresses it, Ireland, civil, should 'become more dangerous than Ireland, savage. 'And it was at length carried into execution, by 'settling a more industrious race from England and 'Scotland, with a success which at once conferred 'celebrity on the Prince, and happiness on the (18) Life, p. 14. 'kingdom (18).' Of the plantation in Ulster, Mr. Hume gives the following account: 'The whole 'province of Ulster having fallen to the crown by 'the attainder of rebels, a company was established 'in London, for planting new colonies in that fertile 'country. The property was divided into moderate 'shares, the largest not exceeding 2000 acres. Te-'nants were brought over from England and Scot-'land; the Irish were removed from the hills and 'fastnesses, and settled in the open country; hus-'bandry and the arts were taught them; a fixed 'habitation secured; plunder and robbery punished; 'and, by these means, Ulster, from being the most 'wild and disorderly province of all Ireland, soon 'became the best cultivated and most civilized (19).' (19) History of England, vol. v. p. 576, 577. edit. 8vo. 1763. Sir John Davies says, 'His Majesty did not utterly 'exclude the natives out of this plantation, with a 'purpose to root them out, as the Irish were ex-'cluded out of the first English colonies; but made 'a mixed plantation of British and Irish, that they 'might grow up together in one nation: only, the 'Irish were in some places transplanted from the 'woods and mountains, into the plains and open 'countries, that, being removed (like wild fruit 'trees), they might grow the milder, and bear the 'better and sweeter fruit (20).' (20) Historical Tracts, p. 222, 223.

[L] A discovery of the true causes, &c.] At the beginning of this piece, Sir John says, 'During the 'time of my service in Ireland (which began in the 'first year of his Majesty's reign) I have visited all 'the provinces of that kingdom, in sundry journies 'and circuits. Wherein I have observed the good 'temperature of the air; the fruitfulness of the soil; 'the pleasant and commodious seats for habitation; 'and safe and large ports and havens lying open for 'traffic, into all the west parts of the world; the 'long inlets of many navigable rivers, and so many 'great lakes and fresh ponds within the land; (as 'the like are not to be seen in any part of Europe) 'the rich fishings, and wild fowl of all kinds; and 'lastly, the bodies and minds of the people, endued 'with extraordinary abilities of nature. The obser-'vation whereof hath bred in me some curiosity, to 'consider, what were the true causes why this king-'dom, whereof our Kings of England have borne 'the title of Sovereign Lords, for the space of four 'hundred and odd years (a period of time wherein 'divers great monarchies have risen from barbarism 'to civility, and fallen again to ruin) was not in all 'that space of time thoroughly subdued and reduced 'to obedience of the Crown of England, although 'there hath been almost a continual war between 'the English and the Irish: and why the manners 'of the mere Irish are so little altered since the days 'of King Henry the Second, as appeareth by the 'description made by Giraldus Cambrensis, (who 'lived and wrote in that time) albeit there have 'been, since that time, so many English colonies 'planted in Ireland, as that, if the people were 'numbered at this day by the poll, such as are 'descended of English race, would be found more in 'number than the antient natives (21).' (21) Ibid. p. 1, 2.

Sir John afterwards observes, that 'the defects 'which hindered the perfection of the conquest of 'Ireland were of two kinds, and consisted, first, in 'the faint prosecution of the war; and next, in the 'looseness of the civil government. For the hus-'bandman must first break the land before it be 'made capable of good seed; and when it is thorough-'ly broken and manured, if he do not forthwith 'cast good seed into it, it will grow wild again, and 'bear nothing but weeds. So a barbarous country 'must be first broken by a war, before it will be 'capable of good government; and when it is fully 'subdued and conquered, if it be not well planted 'and governed after the conquest, it will often re-'turn to the same barbarism (22).' (22) Ibid. p. 3, 4.

Much of the poverty of Ireland, and many of the disorders in it, he attributes to the Brehon law, and custom of Tanistry, which prevailed in that kingdom. 'If we consider,' says he, 'the nature of the 'Irish customs, we shall find that the people which 'doth use them, must of necessity be rebels to all 'good government, destroy the commonwealth where-'in they live, and bring barbarism and desolation 'upon the richest and most fruitful land of the world. 'For, whereas by the just and honourable law of 'England, and by the laws of all other well-governed 'kingdoms and commonwealths, murder, man-'slaughter, rape, robbery, and theft, are punished 'with death, by the Irish custom, or Brehon law, 'the highest of these offences was punished only by 'fine, which they called an ericke. Therefore, when 'Sir William Fitz-Williams (being Lord-Deputy) 'told Maguyre, that he was to send a Sheriff into 'Fermannagh, being lately before made a county; "Your Sheriff (said Maguyre) shall be welcome to "me, but let me know his ericke (or the price of his "head) aforehand; that if my people cut it off, I "may cut the ericke upon the country." As for 'oppression, extortion, and other trespasses, the 'weaker had never any remedy against the stronger: 'whereby it came to pass, that no man could enjoy 'his life, his wife, his lands, or goods in safety, 'if a mightier man than himself had an appetite to 'take the same from him. Wherein they were little 'better than Cannibals, who do hunt one another; 'and he that hath most strength and swiftness, doth 'eat and devour all his fellows.

'Again, in England, and all well-ordered com-

During

' monwealths, men have certain estates in their lands ' and possessions, and their inheritances descend from ' father to son, which doth give them encouragement to build and to plant, and to improve their ' lands, and to make them better for their posterities. But by the Irish custom of Tanistry, the ' chieftains of every country, and the chief of every ' Sept, had no longer estate than for life in their ' chiefries, the inheritance whereof did rest in no ' man. And these chiefries, though they had some ' portions of land allotted unto them, did consist ' chiefly in cuttings and cosheries, and other Irish ' exactions, whereby they did spoil and impoverish ' the people at their pleasure. And when their ' chieftains were dead, their sons or next heirs did ' not succeed them, but their Tanistres, who were ' elective, and purchased their elections by strong ' hand; and by the Irish custom of Gavelkind, the ' inferior tenanties were partable amongst all the ' males of the Sept, both bastards and legitimate: ' and after partition made, if any of the Sept had ' died, his portion was not divided among his sons, ' but the chief of the Sept made a new partition of ' all the lands belonging to that Sept, and gave ' every one his part according to his antiquity.

' These two Irish customs made all their possessions ' uncertain, being shuffled and changed, and removed ' so often from one to another, by new elections and ' partitions; which uncertainty of estates hath been ' the true cause of such desolation and barbarism in ' this land, as the like was never seen in any country ' that professed the name of Christ. For, though ' the Irish be a nation of great antiquity, and wanted ' neither wit nor valour; and though they had received the Christian faith above 1200 years since; ' and were lovers of music, poetry, and all kind of ' learning, and possessed a land abounding with all ' things necessary for the civil life of man; yet ' (which is strange to be related) they did never ' build any houses of brick or stone, some few religious houses excepted, before the reign of King ' Henry the Second, though they were Lords of this ' island for many hundred years before, and since ' the conquest attempted by the English: albeit, ' when they saw us build castles upon their borders, ' they have only, in imitation of us, erected some ' few piles for the Captains of the country: yet I ' dare boldly say, that never any particular person, ' either before or since, did build any stone or brick ' house for his private habitation, but such as have ' lately obtained estates, according to the course of ' the law of England. Neither did any of them in ' all this time plant any gardens or orchards, inclose ' or improve their lands, live together in settled ' villages or towns, nor made any provision for posterity; which being against all common sense and ' reason, must needs be imputed to those unreasonable customs, which made their estates so uncertain ' and transitory in their possessions. For who would ' plant, or improve, or build upon that land, which ' a stranger, whom he knew not, should possess after ' his death? for that (as Solomon noteth) is one of ' the strangest vanities under the sun. And this is ' the true reason why Ulster, and all the Irish counties, are found so waste and desolate at this day; ' and so would they continue to the world's end, if ' these customs were not abolished by the law of ' England (23).'

(23) Historical Tracts, p. 134—138.

But Sir John Davies admits, that the prevalence of these usages and customs in Ireland, was in great part the result of the improper conduct of the English government, which had refused to admit the generality of the native Irish to the benefit of the law of England. ' It is evident,' says he, ' by all the records of this kingdom, that only the English colonies, and some few Septs of the Irish, which were ' enfranchised by special charters, were admitted to ' the benefit and protection of the laws of England; ' and that the Irish generally were held and reputed ' aliens, or rather enemies to the Crown of England; ' insomuch as they were not only disabled to bring ' any actions, but they were so far out of the protection of the law, as it was often adjudged no ' felony to kill a mere Irishman in time of peace (24).'

(24) Ibid. p. 83.

Sir John also observes, that ' by divers heavy ' penal laws, the English were forbidden to marry, ' to foster, to make gossips with the Irish, or to have ' any trade or commerce in their markets or fairs. ' Nay, there was a law made no longer since than ' the twenty-eighth year of Henry the Eighth, that ' the English should not marry with any person of ' Irish blood, though he had gotten a charter of ' denization, unless he had done both homage and ' fealty to the King in the chancery, and were also ' bound by recognizance with sureties, to continue a ' loyal subject (25).'

(25) Ibid. p. 92.

In another place, speaking of the state of the English colonies in Ireland in the reign of Edward III. Sir John Davies says, ' The English of this realm, ' before the coming over of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, were at that time become mere Irish in ' their language, names, apparel, and all their manner of living, and had rejected the English laws, ' and submitted themselves to the Irish, with whom ' they had many marriages and alliances, which ' tended to the utter ruin and destruction of the ' commonwealth: therefore, alliance by marriage, ' nurture of infants, and gossipred with the Irish, ' are by the statute of Kilkenny made high treason. ' Again, if any man of English race should use an ' Irish name, Irish language, or Irish apparel, or ' any other guise or fashion of the Irish; if he had ' lands or tenements, the same should be seized till ' he had given security to the Chancery, to conform ' himself in all points to the English manner of living; and, if he had no lands, his body was to be ' taken and imprisoned, till he found sureties as ' aforesaid. Again, it was established and commanded, that the English in all their controversies ' should be ruled and governed by the common law ' of England; and if any did submit himself to the ' Brehon law, or March law, he should be adjudged ' a traitor.'—' Again, it was made penal to the ' English to permit the Irish to creaght or graze upon ' their lands; to present them to ecclesiastical benefices; to receive them into any monasteries, or religious houses, or to entertain any of their minstrels, rhymers, or news-tellers (26).'

(26) Historical Tracts, p. 169, 170, 171.

' This then,' says Sir John, ' I note as a great ' defect in the civil policy of this kingdom; in that ' for the space of three hundred and fifty years at ' least, after the conquest first attempted, the English laws were not communicated to the Irish, nor ' the benefit and protection thereof allowed unto ' them, though they earnestly desired and sought the ' same. For as long as they were out of the protection of the law, so long as every Englishman ' might oppress, spoil, and kill them without countroul, how was it possible they should be other than ' outlaws and enemies to the Crown of England? ' If the King would not admit them to the condition ' of subjects, how could they learn to acknowledge ' and obey him as their sovereign? when they might ' not converse or commerce with any civil man, nor ' enter into any town or city, without peril of their ' lives; whither should they flee, but into the woods ' and mountains, and there live in a wild and barbarous manner? If the English magistrates would ' not rule them by the law which doth punish treason, and murder, and theft with death, but leave ' them to be ruled by their own Lords and laws, ' why should they not embrace their own Brehon ' law, which punisheth no offence but with a fine or ' ericke? If the Irish be not permitted to purchase ' estates of freeholds or inheritance, which might ' descend to their children, according to the course ' of our common law, must they not continue their ' custom of tanistry? which makes all their possessions

During the ſame year, a Parliament was aſſembled in Ireland, of which Sir John Davies was elected a Member, and he was alſo appointed Speaker; but his election to that office was diſputed [M]. His election, however, being afterwards confirmed, he addreſſed a very learned ſpeech to the Lord-deputy Chicheſter [N], in 1613, when he was preſented and

'ſions uncertain, and brings confuſion, barbariſm,

This performance of Sir John Davies's, which contains information reſpecting the affairs and adminiſtration of Ireland, of the moſt important and authentic kind, has been ſeveral times printed both in Ireland and in England. It was laſt printed with his Hiſtorical Tracts in 1786.

[M] His election to that office was diſputed.] Of the calling of this parliament, and the diſpute concerning Sir John Davies's election to the office of Speaker, the following account is given by the writer of his life prefixed to his Hiſtorical Tracts: 'Amidſt the diſtractions of civil war, and the repoſe 'of ſubſequent periods of improvement, no parliament had been called in Ireland during the laſt 'ſeven and twenty years; yet, never were legiſlative 'acts more neceſſary. The Iriſh nation was divided 'into two parties, whoſe power was nearly equal. 'The Roman Catholics formed the great body of 'the people: the Proteſtants compoſed probably not 'more than one fourth. The laws, however, im'poſed on the objects of their jealouſy many diſ'abilities: and the Proteſtants of conſequence en'joyed all official profit, and all political power. 'When the people and the government ſtand thus 'oppoſed to each other, diſſatisfaction muſt ever 'predominate. Such was the ſtate of Ireland, when 'manifeſt utility induced the Lord-Deputy to iſſue 'writs for a new election in 1612. Both parties 'exerted the artifices and the violences, which ac'company popular elections, when the minds of the 'electors are ſtrongly agitated by hopes or appre'henſions. The Roman Catholic party carried their 'elections chiefly in the counties; the Proteſtant 'party in the boroughs, ſeveral of which had been 'lately erected, during the progreſs of plantation. 'Sir John Davies was elected for the county of Fer'mannagh; being the firſt repreſentative which it 'had ever choſen. The Houſe of Commons con'ſiſted now of two hundred and twenty-five mem'bers. Of theſe there appeared, when the Houſe 'met, of the Proteſtant party, one hundred and 'twenty-one; of the Roman Catholic, one hundred 'and one. This approximation to equality had been 'alone ſufficient to create great intrigues and alter'cation in any popular aſſembly. But, among the 'members who were then aſſembled to chuſe a 'Speaker, and who were animated by a ſenſe of 'antient antipathy, and of recent oppoſition, the 'tumult approached nearly to the bloody ſcenes of a 'Poliſh diet. Sir John Davies was propoſed as 'Speaker by the Court: Sir John Everard, who 'had been an Iriſh judge, but reſigned, becauſe he 'would not take the oath of ſupremacy, was ſup'ported by the Roman Catholic party. The Houſe 'divided. The court members went out, according 'to parliamentary form. But their opponents, con'ſidering themſelves as the majority of legal re'preſentatives, placed Sir John Everard in the chair 'as duly elected. And nothing remained for the 'real majority but to remove the intruder, or to 'place the true Speaker in the ſame chair. The 'perſeverance of the majority induced the minority 'to ſecede from an aſſembly, which they thus found 'they could not rule. All parties had been ſo much 'accuſtomed in that country to attempt every thing 'by force, that the parliament-men had not yet 'learnt to defeat, or to qualify, diſagreeable mea'ſures by ſly intrigue, pertinacious debate, or by 'cloſe diviſions. The great body of the people ap'plauded the ſeceders. And the Lord-Deputy Chi'cheſter, whoſe prudence was equal to his firmneſs, 'prorogued the parliament, in order to ſuffer men's 'minds to cool, and to enable the ſeceding members
(28) Life, p. 16, 17, 18. 'to lay their complaints before the King (28).'

The diſpute concerning the Speaker of the Iriſh Houſe of Commons was afterwards determined, by the King and Privy-Council of England, in favour of Sir John Davies. In a ſpeech made by James at this time to the Iriſh agents, at Whitehall, is the following paſſage: 'There were in the lower Houſe 'two bodies, and but one head; a greater monſter 'than two heads upon one body. And whereas you 'ſhould have made an humble and dutiful anſwer to 'the commendation which I made of a Speaker, you 'the recuſant party (being the fewer) when the 'greater number went out to be numbered, ſhut the 'door, and thruſt one into the chair as a Speaker 'manu forti. After this, the recuſants of both 'Houſes depart from the parliament. The like was 'never heard of in France, Spain, or any other 'kingdom of Chriſtendom (29).' In the ſame ſpeech the King alſo ſays, 'In contending for a 'Committee, before you agreed of a Speaker, you 'did put the plough before the horſe, ſo as it went 'on untowardly, like your Iriſh ploughs (30).'

[N] He addreſſed a very learned ſpeech to the Lord-Deputy Chicheſter.] This ſpeech was firſt publiſhed by Dr. Thomas Leland, in the ſecond volume of his Hiſtory of Ireland. He has pointed out ſome miſtakes in it; but ſtyles Sir John Davies "an able and "judicious inquirer into the affairs of Ireland (31)." It is obſerved by the writer of our author's life prefixed to his Hiſtorical Tracts, that "this is un"queſtionably one of the moſt learned and inſtructive "orations that ever was pronounced by the Speaker "of the parliament in either kingdom. It was ſea"ſonable too, at a time when parliaments had been "ſo long diſuſed. He minutely traces the hiſtory of "the Iriſh legiſlature, which, from the epoch of "Poyning's act, was extremely complex; and he "throws many rays of light on a ſubject, which was "in thoſe days involved in peculiar obſcurity (32)."

(32) Life, p. 20.

Towards the cloſe of this ſpeech Sir John Davies flattered King James as groſsly in proſe, as he had formerly flattered Queen Elizabeth in verſe. He ſays to the Lord-Deputy, 'Right Honourable Lord, 'though you have no need of my praiſe, yet it is 'moſt needful in reſpect of the place you hold, that 'your Lordſhip ſhould be adorned with all praiſe'worthy virtues. You had need be a moſt virtuous 'and worthy Deputy, ſince you ſit in the throne, 'and repreſent the perſon of the moſt virtuous and 'excellent King in the world. For he that doth 'fight with the ſword of a King, and write with the 'pen of a King; he that hath the juſtice, mercy, 'and bounty of a King in his hands, had need be 'furniſhed with thoſe noble powers and virtues as 'are fit for the rule and government of a kingdom, 'eſpecially if he hold the place of ſuch a King as 'our moſt renowned and gracious ſovereign is, who 'is the greateſt and beſt King that now reigneth 'upon the face of the earth. I call him the greateſt 'King, not ſo much for the largeneſs and extent of 'his territories, nor for the multitude of his ſub'jects, though he be in poſſeſſion of three great 'kingdoms, and doth command more martial and 'able men than any King in Europe at this day. 'But I will call him indeed the greateſt King, for 'his exceeding great meaſure of goodneſs and virtue, 'and for the great grace and favour that his Majeſty 'ſtandeth in with the divine Majeſty, the King of 'Kings. For if that man be accounted the greateſt 'ſubject of a kingdom that is in higheſt favour with 'a King upon earth, why ſhould not that King be 'the greateſt King on earth, that is in greateſt 'favour with the King of Heaven? And that our 'moſt gracious ſovereign ſtandeth in higheſt favour 'with Almighty God, doth not only appear by the 'innumerable bleſſings poured from heaven upon 'him, and upon his kingdoms for his ſake, but by 'the ſpecial providence and care God hath always 'had of his ſacred perſon, by protecting and deliver'ing him from his enemies. Again, I will call his 'Majeſty the beſt King, for that he is a moſt juſt 'King, and approved as Speaker. It is obſerved by Dr. Leland, that this was the firſt Houſe of Commons formed in Ireland "by a general repreſentation, inſtead of being confined to "Members ſent by the counties and boroughs of the Pale (n)." In this Parliament, the King's right to the Crown of Ireland was recognized; an Act of General Indemnity was paſſed, with an exception of Tyrone, Tyrconnel, and O'Dogharty; ſome antient laws were repealed, which had prohibited intercourſe between the Engliſh within the Pale, or five counties round Dublin, and the Iriſh without; acts were paſſed for the improvement of the police; and an entire ſubſidy was granted, to relieve the King from the continual expence of ſupporting the Iriſh Government (o).

In 1614, Sir John Davies publiſhed "A Declaration of our Sovereign Lord the King, "concerning the Title of his Majeſty's Son, Charles, Prince of Wales, and Duke of "Cornwall." The ſame year he was elected a Member of the Society of Antiquaries (p). In 1615, he publiſhed, at Dublin, in folio, his Reports of Caſes adjudged in the King's Courts in Ireland; to which he prefixed a Preface, addreſſed to Lord Elleſmere, Lord-Chancellor of England, which is juſtly eſteemed one of the beſt prefaces that ever was prefixed to a law-book. It contains a very learned and eloquent eulogium on the Common Law of England [O], and a Vindication of its Profeſſors. Soon after the publication

'King, and juſtice is the beſt of all kingly virtues; 'and for that alſo he is a moſt bountiful King, reſembling therein the divine goodneſs, ever ſpreading and communicating his riches unto others, 'which we muſt needs remember in this kingdom; 'for we cannot forget it without ingratitude, ſince 'we all know that his Majeſty doth not only expend 'the whole revenue of this land upon itſelf, but 'ſpares yearly out of England a great maſs of treaſure, to ſupport the extraordinary charge thereof, 'out of which the greater number of us here preſent, by entertainments, penſions, or rewards, do 'taſte every day of his Majeſty's bounty.

'Laſtly, his Majeſty ought to be called the beſt 'King, as well for his ſweet inclination to peace, 'whereby he doth make happy both his own dominions, and alſo his neighbour kingdoms round 'about him, as for his ſingular piety and religion 'towards God, which is the beſt and higheſt praiſe 'that can be given to any Prince. But I ſhould 'launch forth into a main ſea, that hath neither 'bottom nor ſhore, if I ſhould proceed farther in the 'praiſe of ſuch a Prince, whoſe worthineſs exceeds 'all degrees of compariſon. It is a theme too high, 'and too large for me to handle: it becometh me 'better to give thanks than praiſe (33).'

(33) Hiſtorical Tracts, p. 314, 315, 316, 317.

[O] Eulogium on the Common Law of England.] The Common Law of England, ſays he, 'is nothing 'elſe but the common cuſtom of the realm; and a 'cuſtom which hath obtained the force of a law, is 'always ſaid to be Jus non ſcriptum, for it cannot be 'made or created, either by charter, or by parliament, which are acts reduced to writing, and are 'always matter of record, but being only matter of 'fact, and conſiſting in uſe and practice, it can be 'recorded and regiſtered no where, but in the 'memory of the people. For a cuſtom taketh beginning, and groweth to perfection in this manner: when a reaſonable act once done is found to 'be good and beneficial to the people, and agreeable to their nature and diſpoſition, then do they 'uſe it, and practiſe it, again and again, and ſo by 'often iteration, and multiplication of the act, it 'becometh a cuſtom, and being continued without 'interruption time out of mind, it obtaineth the 'force of a law. And this cuſtomary law is the moſt 'perfect, and moſt excellent, and without compariſon the beſt, to make and preſerve a common-'wealth; for the written laws which are made either 'by the edicts of Princes, or by Counſels of eſtate, 'are impoſed upon the ſubject before any trial or 'probation made, whether the ſame be fit and 'agreeable to the nature and diſpoſition of the 'people, or whether they will breed any inconvenience or no. But a cuſtom doth never become a 'law to bind the people, until it hath been tried 'and approved time out of mind, during all which 'time there did thereby ariſe no inconvenience; for 'if it had been found inconvenient at any time, it 'had been uſed no longer, but had been interrupted, and conſequently it had loſt the virtue and 'force of a law. Therefore, as the law of nature, 'which the ſchoolmen call Jus commune, and which 'is alſo Jus non ſcriptum, being written only in the 'heart of man, is better than all the written laws in 'the world to make men honeſt and happy in this 'life, if they would obſerve the rules thereof: ſo 'the cuſtomary law of England, which we do likewiſe call Jus commune, as coming neareſt to the 'law of nature, which is the root and touchſtone of 'all good laws, and which is alſo Jus non ſcriptum, 'and written only in the memory of man (for every 'cuſtom, though it took beginning beyond the 'memory of any living man, yet it is continued and 'preſerved in the memory of men living) doth far 'excel our written laws, namely our ſtatutes or acts 'of parliament: which is manifeſt in this, that 'when our parliaments have altered or changed any 'fundamental points of the common law, thoſe 'alterations have been found by experience to be ſo 'inconvenient for the commonwealth, as that the 'common law hath in effect been reſtored again, in 'the ſame points, by other acts of parliament, in 'ſucceeding ages. And as our cuſtomary unwritten 'law doth excel our parliament laws, which are 'written, ſo for the government of the common-'weal of England (which is as well inſtituted and 'eſtabliſhed as any commonwealth in Chriſtendom,) 'our native common law is far more apt and agreeable, than the civil or canon law, or any other written law in the world beſides: howſoever ſome of our 'countrymen, who are civet in aliena republica, & hoſpites in ſua, may perhaps affirm the contrary. But certain it is, that the great and wiſe men of England, in 'the parliament of Merton, did not prefer a foreign law 'before their own, when motion being made by the 'clergy, that children born before marriage might 'be adjudged legitimate, they all made anſwer with 'one voice, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. And again, 'in 11 R. 2. when a new courſe of proceeding in 'criminal cauſes, according to the form of the civil 'law, was propounded in that unruly parliament, 'anſwer was made by all the eſtates, that the realm 'of England neither had been in former times, nor 'hereafter ſhould be, ruled and governed by the 'civil law, Rot. Parliam. 11 R. 2. in Archiv. Turris. 'And here I may obſerve, for the honour of our 'nation, and of our anceſtors, who have founded 'this common-weal wherein we live, and enjoy ſo 'many felicities, That England having had a good 'and happy genius from the beginning, hath been 'inhabited always with a virtuous and wiſe people, 'who ever embraced honeſt and good cuſtoms, full 'of reaſon and conveniency, which being confirmed 'by common uſe and practice, and continued time 'out of mind, became the common law of the land. 'And though this law be the peculiar invention of 'this nation, and delivered over from age to age by 'tradition (for the common law of England is a 'tradition, and learned by tradition as well as by 'books) yet we may truly ſay, That no human law, 'written or unwritten, hath more certainty in the 'rules and maxims, more coherence in the parts 'thereof, or more harmony of reaſon in it: nay, we tion of this work, Sir John Davies appears to have quitted Ireland; and he ſeems to have been induced to leave that kingdom, in conſequence of a change in its Adminiſtration [P]. After his return to England, he was appointed to act as one of the Juſtices of Aſſize in ſeveral circuits (q). He was alſo elected a Member of the Houſe of Commons, for Newcaſtle-under-line, in the Parliament which was aſſembled at the beginning of the year 1621. On the fifth of February, that year, he made a ſpeech in behalf of a ſupply to be granted to the King (r); but he ſeems not often to have ſpoken in Parliament at this period [Q]. He was, however, about to have been placed in a ſtation of higher dignity, when he was carried off by an apoplexy, in the night of the ſeventh of December, 1626, in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age. He had ſupped that night with the Lord-keeper Coventry, having been previouſly appointed Lord Chief Juſtice of England [R], in the room of Sir ‘ may confidently aver, that it doth excel all other ‘ laws in upholding a free monarchy, which is the ‘ moſt excellent form of government, exalting the ‘ prerogative royal, and being very tender and watchful to preſerve it, and yet maintaining withal the ‘ ingenuous liberty of the ſubject. Briefly, it is ſo ‘ framed and fitted to the nature and diſpoſition of ‘ this people, as we may properly ſay it is connatural ‘ to the nation, ſo as it cannot poſſibly be ruled by ‘ any other law. This law, therefore, doth demonſtrate the ſtrength of wit and reaſon, and ſelf-ſufficiency, which hath been always in the people ‘ of this land, which have made their own laws out ‘ of their wiſdom and experience (like a ſilk-worm ‘ that formeth all her web out of herſelf only) not ‘ begging or borrowing a form of a common-weal, ‘ either from Rome or from Greece, as all other ‘ nations of Europe have done, but having ſufficient ‘ proviſion of law and juſtice within the land, have ‘ no need Juſtitiam & judicium ab alienigenis emendicare, as King John wrote moſt nobly to Pope ‘ Innocent the Third, Matth. Pariſ. Hiſtor. magn. ‘ p. 215. En populus ſapiens & intelligens, gens magna: as it is ſaid of God's choſen people, ‘ 4 Deut. Neither could any one man ever vaunt ‘ that like Minos, Solon, or Lycurgus, he was the ‘ firſt lawgiver to our nation: for neither did the ‘ King make his own prerogative, nor the judges ‘ make the rules or maxims of the law, nor the common ſubject preſcribe and limit the liberties which ‘ he enjoyeth by the law. But as it is ſaid of every ‘ art or ſcience, which is brought to perfection, ‘ Per varios uſus artem experientia fecit; ſo it may be ‘ properly ſaid of our law, Per varios uſus legem experientia fecit: Long experience, and many trials ‘ of what was beſt for the common good, did make ‘ the COMMON LAW (34).”

(35) Life, p. 23.

[Q] He ſeems not often to have ſpoken in parliament at this period.] It is remarked by the writer of his life, that ‘ Sir John Davies ſeldom ſpoke, except on ‘ the affairs of Ireland, being, from his office of ‘ King's ſerjeant, perhaps more than from principle, ‘ a favourer of the court. When it was moved to ‘ acquaint the King with the grievances of Ireland, ‘ conſidering how much blood and treaſure it had ‘ coſt this kingdom, Sir John ſaid, It is expreſsly in ‘ the law-books ſet down, that Ireland is a member ‘ of the Crown of England; yet this kingdom here ‘ cannot make laws to bind that kingdom; for they ‘ have there a parliament of their own. Sir Edward ‘ Coke, who was the experienced leader of that ‘ Houſe, ſuggeſted, that they ought to conſider, ‘ firſt, what we may do; and ſecondly, what it fit to be done in a parliamentary courſe. Ireland, ſays ‘ he, was never totally reduced till the coming of ‘ this King; for there was ever a back door in the ‘ north of that kingdom. If Ireland be not ſafe, we ‘ cannot be ſure; but if Ireland be ſafe, our navy ‘ well furniſhed, and the low-countrymen our faſt ‘ friends, we need not fear the Pope, or the Devil. ‘ It is both fit and lawful for us to complain for ‘ Ireland: that on ſuch complaints the King doth ‘ order a reformation, and thoſe things which may ‘ not be reformed but by a parliament, his Majeſty ‘ doth put in a courſe, by giving order for a parliament in Ireland, to remedy the abuſes there. ‘ Conſidering recent tranſactions, this is ſurely a ‘ remarkable debate. Sir John Davies was the firſt, ‘ we ſee, who, in the Houſe of Commons, contended, that the parliament of England could not make ‘ laws to bind the people of Ireland, becauſe they ‘ had a parliament of their own. And Sir Edward ‘ Coke, when giving his opinion, as to what they might do, admits rather than denies a poſition, ‘ which having been at length formally acknowledged, hath eſtabliſhed the independence of the ‘ Iriſh nation.

‘ It is a remark, which does no little credit to ‘ Ireland, that ſcarcely any man ever enjoyed the ‘ offices of her government, who did not prove for ‘ ever after her ſtrenuous defender. Sir John Davies ‘ again evinced how much he was a zealous friend, ‘ by defending her intereſts in an affair, which was ‘ then of full as much importance to her. A bill ‘ was introduced, in April 1621, againſt the importation of Iriſh cattle into England, and prohibiting the exportation of coin from this kingdom ‘ to Ireland. It is curious to trace the ſentiments ‘ of members, from their ſpeeches on two ſubjects, ‘ which were in thoſe days little underſtood. Mr. ‘ Wentworth approved of the bill, as far as it went ‘ to prevent the export of coin; but would not have ‘ victuals reſtrained, which would undo the poor, to ‘ enrich the gentleman. Sir John Ipſley ſaid, that ‘ there is half as much ſpent by thoſe of Ireland, ‘ here in England, as they received for Iriſh cattle, ‘ as there is no houſehold ſtuff uſed in Ireland, but ‘ what comes out of England. Sir Robert Philips ‘ inſiſted, that the price of victuals in Somerſetſhire ‘ is, notwithſtanding the importation of Iriſh cattle, ‘ which mar the breed of England, as dear as ever; ‘ yet it hath cauſed the export of twenty thouſand ‘ pounds out of Somerſetſhire only. Sir Edward ‘ Sackville remarked, that it is not cheapneſs, but ‘ money, which enricheth the kingdom; and if Iriſh ‘ cattle be brought in, and our money ſent out, we ‘ ſhall ſtill be poor. On the contrary, Sir John ‘ Davies contended, that cattle being the principal ‘ commodity of Ireland, and its wool coarſe, if we ‘ bar the importation of cattle, we ſhall impoveriſh ‘ that kingdom, and diſcourage its tillage; by which ‘ means, that country would be again reduced to ‘ barbariſm: that no money being current in Ireland ‘ but Engliſh, and there being no mint, as in the ‘ time of King John and Edward the Fourth, if we ‘ prevent the import of cattle, and not petition the ‘ King for a coinage, or a currency of foreign coin, ‘ the new planters in thoſe parts will ſoon leave the ‘ kingdom. He hoped, that the Houſe would not ‘ deal worſe with Ireland, which was a member of ‘ this crown, than we do with the low countries, ‘ which carry away infinite ſums for their Frieſland ‘ horſes, that are chiefly uſed here for coaches. The ‘ bill was thereupon re-committed, and finally loſt ‘ (36).’

[R] Appointed Lord Chief Juſtice of England.] Anthony Wood ſays, that ‘ being conſtituted Lord ‘ Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, he had his ‘ robes made in order to be ſettled in that high ‘ office, as his daughter hath ſeveral times reported, ‘ but died ſuddenly, before the ceremony of ſettlement or inſtallation could be performed (37).’

Randolph Crew (s). He was buried in the Church of St. Martin in the Fields, where a monument was fixed on a pillar near his grave, with an inſcription on it, giving him the following character: Vir ingenio compto, rarâ facundiâ, oratione cum ſolutâ, tum numeris aſtrictâ, fæliciſſimus: Juridicam ſeveritatem morum elegantiâ, et amœniore eruditione mitigavit: Patronus fidus, Judex incorruptus, ingenuæ pietatis amore, et anxiæ ſuperſtitionis contemptu, juxta inſignis (t). 'He was a man of fine genius, and of uncommon eloquence; 'and an excellent writer both in proſe and in verſe. He tempered the ſeverity of the 'lawyer by the elegance of his manners, and the accompliſhments of polite literature. 'He was a faithful advocate, and an incorrupt judge; and equally remarkable for his con-'tempt of ſuperſtition, and his attachment to ſincere and genuine piety.'

Sir John Davies was a very able and learned Lawyer; and the pieces written by him concerning Ireland are extremely valuable. They are written with great perſpicuity, and are the reſult of deep knowledge, and diligent inveſtigation. He was one of the beſt proſe writers of his time; and his poetical pieces have conſiderable excellence: but he ſeems not hitherto to have obtained a reputation adequate to his merit. A new edition of his poetical works, conſiſting of his "Poem on the Immortality of the Soul; the Hymns of "Aſtrea; and Orcheſtra, a Poem on Dancing [S];" was publiſhed, in ſmall 8*vo.* in 1773, by Mr. Thomas Davies. In 1786, his Diſcovery of the true cauſes why Ireland was never entirely ſubdued, &c. his two letters to the Earl of Saliſbury, and his ſpeech to the Lord-Deputy Chicheſter, were publiſhed together in one volume, 8*vo.* under the title of "Hiſtorical Tracts by Sir John Davies." To theſe a life of him was prefixed, to which we have been much indebted in the courſe of this article.

Beſides the works already mentioned, Sir John Davies was the author of an Abridgment of Sir Edward Coke's Reports, in Law French, which was tranſlated into Engliſh after his deceaſe, and publiſhed in 1651. His own Reports, which were at firſt publiſhed in Law French, in folio, were alſo afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh, and reduced to an octavo ſize (u). He was alſo author of a piece, intitled, "Jus imponendi vectigalia: or, "the learning touching cuſtoms, tonnage, poundage, and impoſitions on merchandizes, "&c (w)." Some of his charges to Grand Juries, as a Judge of Aſſize, are preſerved among the Harleian MSS. in the Britiſh Muſeum.

Sir John Davies married Eleanor Touchet, youngeſt daughter of George Lord Audley, Earl of Caſtlehaven, by whom he had one ſon, who was an idiot, and died young, and a daughter named Lucy, who was married to Ferdinando Lord Haſtings, afterwards Earl of Huntingdon. Sir John's Lady was a very ſingular character, and dealt much in prophecies [T], which brought on her very rigorous treatment after the death of her huſband, whom

[S] Orcheſtra, a Poem on Dancing.] This poem conſiſts of more than one hundred and thirty ſtanzas; but it is unfiniſhed. The following are the five firſt ſtanzas;

I.

'Where lives the man that never yet did hear
'Of chaſte Penelope, Ulyſſes' Queen?
'Who kept her faith unſpotted twenty year,
'Till he return'd that far away had been,
'And many men, and many towns had ſeen:
'Ten year at ſiege of Troy he ling'ring lay,
'And ten year in the midland ſea did ſtray.

II.

'Homer, to whom the muſes did carouſe
'A great deep cup with heav'nly nectar fill'd,
'The greateſt, deepeſt cup in Jove's great houſe,
'(For Jove himſelf had ſo expreſsly will'd)
'He drank off all, nor let one drop be ſpill'd;
'Since when his brain that had before been dry,
'Became the well-ſpring of all poetry.

III.

'Homer doth tell in his abundant verſe
'The long laborious travels of the man,
'And of his Lady too he doth rehearſe
'How ſhe illudes with all the art ſhe can,
'Th' ungrateful love which other Lords began:
'For of her Lord, falſe fame had long ſince ſworn,
'That Neptune's monſters had his carcaſe torn.

IV.

'All this he tells, but one thing he forgot,
'One thing moſt worthy his eternal ſong,
'But he was old, and blind, and ſaw it not,
'Or elſe he thought he ſhould Ulyſſes wrong,
'To mingle it his tragic acts among:
'Yet was there not in all the world of things,
'A ſweeter burthen for his muſes wings.

V.

'The courtly love Antinous did make,
'Antinous that freſh and jolly knight,
'Which of the gallants that did undertake
'To win the widow, had moſt wealth and might,
'Wit to perſuade, and beauty to delight.
'The courtly love he made unto the Queen,
'Homer forgot, as if it had not been (38).'

(38) Poetical Works, p. 137, 138, 139.

In the panegyric on dancing, addreſſed by Antinous to Penelope, are the following lines:

'Dancing, bright Lady, then began to be,
'When the firſt ſeeds whereof the world did ſpring,
'The fire, air, earth and water did agree,
'By love's perſuaſion, nature's mighty King,
'To leave their firſt diſorder'd combating;
'And in a dance ſuch meaſure to obſerve,
'As all the world their motion ſhould preſerve.

'Since when they ſtill are carried in a round,
'And changing come one in another's place,
'Yet do they neither mingle nor confound,
'But ev'ry one doth keep the bounded ſpace
'Wherein the dance doth bid it turn or trace:
'This wond'rous miracle doth love deviſe,
'For dancing is love's proper exerciſe (39).'

(39) Ibid. p. 143.

[T] Dealt much in prophecies.] An account was publiſhed of her prophecies in 1649, in 4to. under the title of Strange and wonderful prophecies. She was reported to have foretold the death of her huſband. Anthony Wood, ſpeaking of the time of Sir John Davies's death, ſays, 'It was then commonly 'rumoured, that his prophetical Lady had foretold 'his death in ſome manner, on the Sunday going be-'fore. For while ſhe ſat at dinner by him, ſhe ſud-'denly burſt out with tears: whereupon he aſking 'her what the matter was, ſhe anſwered, "Huſband, "theſe are your funeral tears;" to which he made 'reply, whom she survived many years. She died in 1652, in the parish of St. Bride's, and was interred near the remains of her husband in St. Martin's Church (x).] T. (x) Id. ibid.

'reply, "Pray, therefore, spare your tears now, and "I will be content that you shall laugh when I am "dead (40)."

Lady Davies also foretold the death of Archbishop Laud, but appears to have been mistaken as to the time. Dr. Heylin, speaking of attacks made by several men against Archbishop Laud in the year 1634, says, 'That the other sex might whet their tongues 'upon him also, the Lady Davies, the widow of Sir 'John Davies, Attorney-General for King James in 'the realm of Ireland, scatters a prophecy against 'him. This Lady had before spoken something unluckily of the Duke of Buckingham, importing, 'that he should not live till the end of August, which 'raised her to the reputation of a cunning woman 'amongst the ignorant people: and now she prophesies of the new Archbishop, that he should live but 'few days after the fifth of November; for which, 'and other prophecies of a more mischievous nature, 'she was after brought into the Court of High Commission; the woman being grown so mad, that she 'fancied the spirit of the prophet Daniel to have 'been infused into her body. And this she grounded 'on an anagram which she made of her name, viz. 'ELEANOR DAVIES, REVEAL O DANIEL: 'and though the anagram had too much by an L, 'and too little by an S; yet she found Daniel and 'Reveal in it, and that served her turn. Much pains 'was taken by the Court to dispossess her of this 'spirit; but all would not do, till Lamb, then Dean 'of the Arches, shot her through and through, with 'an arrow borrowed from her own quiver: for whilst 'the Bishops and Divines were reasoning the point 'with her out of Holy Scripture, he took a pen into 'his hand, and at last hit upon this excellent anagram, viz. DAME ELEANOR DAVIES, NEVER 'SO MAD A LADIE: which having proved to be 'true by the rules of art, "Madam," said he, "I "see you build much on anagrams, and I have found "one which I hope will fit you." 'This said, and 'reading it aloud, he put it into her hands in writ'ing; which happy fancy brought that grave Court 'into such a laughter, and the poor woman there'upon into such a confusion, that afterwards she grew 'either wiser, or was less regarded (41).'

It appears that Lady Davies about this time made a journey into Holland, where she published one of her prophecies at Amsterdam, and inscribed it to the Elector Prince Charles of the Rhine. But after her return to England, she was prosecuted in the High Commission Court, particularly for what was called "an enthusiastical petition to King Charles;" and appears to have been treated with great rigour and cruelty. She was fined three thousand pounds, and closely imprisoned two years in the Gatehouse, Westminster. She is also said to have been confined several years in Bethlem Hospital, and in the Tower of London; and she complained, that, during part of her imprisonment, she was not allowed the use of a Bible, nor permitted to have the attendance of a female servant (42).]

DAVIES (JOHN), a learned Critic in the XVIIIth century, was born in London April 22, 1679. His father was a Merchant, or Tradesman, in that city, who died while his children were young; and his mother (a), a daughter of Sir John Turton, Knight [A]. Our author was educated in grammar learning at the Charterhouse-school; and admitted, June 8, 1695, into Queen's-College in Cambridge, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1698. He was, on the 7th of July 1701, elected Fellow of that College (b); and the year following took the degree of Master of Arts. In 1709 he had the honour of being one of the Proctors of the University. Having now distinguished himself by his many excellent qualifications, he was collated in 1711, by Dr. John Moore, Bishop of Ely, that great patron of learning and learned men, to the rectory of Fen-Ditton near Cambridge, and to a Prebend in the Church of Ely (c). The same year he took the degree of Doctor in Laws. Upon the death of Dr. James, he was chosen in his room Master of Queen's College, March 23, 1716-17: and created Doctor in Divinity in 1717, when King George I. was at Cambridge (d). This learned person died March 7, 1731-2, in the fifty-third year of his age; and was buried in the middle of Queen's-College-Chapel. Soon after, a handsome flat marble stone was laid over his grave, with an inscription [B]. As the several things which he hath published, are in Greek, or Latin, we will, for that reason, give an account of them only in the note [C]. We shall not attempt this learned and industrious man's character, lest it should

Next, he undertook to publish new and beautiful editions of M. T. Cicero's Philosophical pieces, by way of supplement to what the most moſt learned Grævius had publiſhed of that excellent author, but had been hindered by death from finiſhing. He put out therefore in 1708, 1. his Tuſculan Diſputations, under this title; *M. But the houſe where Dr. Bentley lodged (in the Strand, London) being ſet on fire thro' his careleſſneſs, as 'tis ſaid, in reading after he was in bed, Dr. Davies's notes and emendations periſhed in the flames, and ſo were irrecoverably loſt (4).
